LORD VISCOUNT BOLINGBROKE.

HERE are fome characters that feem formed by nature to take delight in ftruggling with oppofition, and whofe most agreeable hours are passed in ftorms of their own creating. The subject of the present sketch was perhaps of all others the most indefatigable in raising himself enemies, to shew his power in subduing them; and was not less employed in improving his superior talents, than in finding objects on which to exercise their activity. His life was spent in a continued conflict of politics, and as if that was too short for the combat, he has left his memory as a subject of lasting contention.

It is indeed no eafy matter to preferve an acknowledged impartiality, in talking of a man fo differently regarded on account of his political, as well as his religious principles. Those whom his politics may please, will be fure to condemn him for his religion; and on the contrary, those most Vol. I. a ftrongly ftrongly attached to his theological opinions, are the moft likely to decry his politics. On whatever fide he is regarded, he is fure to have oppofers, and this was perhaps what he moft defired, having from nature a mind better pleafed with the ftruggle than the victory.

HENRY ST. JOHN, Lord Viscount Bolingbroke, was born in the year 1672, at Batterfea in Surry, at a feat that had been in the poffession of his ancestors for ages before. His family was of the first rank, equally confpicuous for its an-tiquity, dignity, and large possessions.† It is found to trace its original as high as ADAM DE PORT, Baron of Bafing in Hampshire, before the Conquest; and in a fuccession of ages to have produced warriors, patriots, and statesmen, some of whom were confpicuous for their loyalty and others for their defending the rights of the people. His grandfather Sir WALTER ST. JOHN, of Batterfea, marrying one of the daughters of lord chief juffice ST. JOHN, who as all know was ftrongly attached to the republican party, HENRY, the fubject of the present memoir, was brought up in his family, and confequently imbibed the first principles of his education amongst the diffenters. At that time DANIEL BURGESS, a fanatic of a very peculiar kind, being'at once possefied of zeal and humour, and as well known for the archnefs of his conceits as the furious obflinacy of his principles, was confeffor in the prefbyterian way to his grandmother, and was appointed to direct our author's first studies. Nothing is fo apt to difgust a feeling mind as mistaken zeal; and perhaps the abfurdity of the first lectures he received, might have given him that contempt for all religions, which he might have juftly conceived against one. Indeed no task can be more mortifying than that he was condemned to undergo: " I was obliged, fays he in one place, while yet a boy, to " read.

" read over the commentaries of Dr. MANTON, whofe pride " it was to have made an hundred and nineteen fermons, on " the hundred and nineteenth pfalm." Dr. MANTON and his fermons were not likely to prevail much on one, who was, perhaps, the most fharp-fighted in the world at difcovering the abfurdities of others, however he might have been guilty of eftablishing many of his own.

But thefe dreary inflitutions were of no very long continuance; as foon as it was fit to take him out of the hands of the women, he was fent to Eton fchool, and removed thence to Chrift-church college in Oxford. [His genius and underftanding were feen and admired in both thefe feminarics, but his love of pleafure had fo much the afcendency, that he feemed contented rather with the confcioufnefs of his own great powers, than their exertion. However his friends, and thofe who knew him moft intimately, were thoroughly fenfible of the extent of his mind; and when he left the univerfity, he was confidered as one who had the faireft opportunity of making a fhining figure in active life.

NATURE feemed not lefs kind to him in her external embellifhments, than in adorning his mind. With the graces of an handfome perfon, and a face in which dignity was happily blended with fweetnefs, he had a manner of addrefs that was very engaging. His vivacity was always awake, his apprehenfion was quick, his wit refined, and his memory amazing: his fubtlety in thinking and reafoning were profound, and all thefe talents were adorned with an elocution that was irrefiftible.

To the affemblage of fo many gifts from nature, it was expected that art would foon give her finishing hand; and that a youth begun in excellence, would foon arrive at perfection : but such is the perverseness of human nature, that an age which fhould have been employed in the acquifition of knowledge, was diffipated in pleafure, and inftead of aiming to excel in praife-worthy purfuits, BOLINGBROKE feemed more ambitious of being thought the greatest rake about town. This period might have been compared to that of fermentation in liquors, which grow muddy before they brighten; but it must also be confest, that those liquors which never ferment are feldom clear. In this state of diforder he was not without his lucid intervals; and even while he was noted for keeping Mifs GUMLEY, the most expensive proftitute in the kingdom, and bearing the greatest quantity of wine without intoxication, he even then despifed his paltry ambition. " The love of fludy, fays he, and defire of " knowledge, were what I felt all my life; and though my " genius, unlike the dæmon of Socrates, whilpered fo " foftly, that very often I heard him not in the hurry of " thefe passions with which I was transported, yet some " calmer hours there were, and in them I hearkened to " him." These fecret admonitions were indeed very few, fince his exceffes are remembered to this very day. I have fpoke to an old man, who affured me that he faw him and another of his companions run naked through the Park, in a fit of intoxication; but then it was a time when public decency might be transgreffed with less danger than at prefent.

DURING this period, as all his attachments were to pleafure, fo his fludies only feemed to lean that way. His firft attempts were in poetry, in which he difcovers more wit than tafte, more labour than harmony in his verification. We have a copy of his verifes prefixed to DRYDEN'S Virgil, complimenting

plimenting the poet, and praifing his translation. We have another not fo well known, prefixed to a French work, published in Holland, by the Chevalier de ST. HYACINTH, intituled, le Chef de Oeuvre d'un Inconnu. This performance is an humourous piece of criticism upon a miserable old ballad, and BOLINGBROKE's compliment, though written in English, is printed in Greek characters, fo that at the first glance it may deceive the eye, and be mistaken for real Greek. There are two or three things more of his compofition, which have appeared fince his death, but which neither do honour to his parts or memory.

In this mad career of pleafure he continued for fome time; but at length in 1700, when he arrived at the twenty-eighth year of his age, he began to take a diflike to his method of living, and to find that fenfual pleafure alone was not fufficient to make the happiness of a reasonable creature. He therefore made his first effort to break from his state of infatuation, by marrying the daughter and coheirefs of Sir HENRY WINCHESCOME, a descendant from the famous JACK of NEW-BURY, who though but a clothier in the reign of HENRY VIII. was able to entertain the king and all his retinue in the most fplendid manner. This lady was possefied of a fortune exceeding forty thousand pounds, and was not deficient in mental accomplishments; but whether he was not yet fully fatiated with his former pleafures, or whether her temper was not conformable to his own, it is certain they were far from living happily together. After cohabiting for fome time together, they parted by mutual confent, both equally displeased; he complaining of the obstinacy of her temper, fhe of the shamelessness of his infidelity. A great part of her fortune some time after upon his attainder was given-her back, but as her family eftates were fettled upon him, he enjoyed

HAVING taken a refolution to quit the allurements of pleafure for the ftronger attractions of ambition, foon after his marriage he procured a feat in the house of commons, being elected for the borough of Wotton-Baffet, in Wiltfhire, his father having ferved feveral times for the fame place. Befides his natural endowments and his large fortune, he had other very confiderable advantages that gave him weight in the fenate, and feconded his views of preferment. His grandfather Sir WALTER ST. JOHN was still alive, and that gentleman's interest was fo great in his own county of Wilts, that he reprefented it in two parliaments in a former reign. His father also was then the representative for the fame, and the interest of his wife's family in the house was very extensive. Thus Bolingbroke took his feat with many accidental helps, but his chief and great refource lay in his own extensive abilities.

At that time the whig and the tory parties were firongly oppofed in the houfe, and pretty nearly balanced. In the latter years of King WILLIAM, the tories, who from every motive were oppofed to the court, had been gaining popularity, and now began to make a public ftand againft their competitors. ROBERT HARLEY, afterwards earl of Oxford, a ftaunch and confirmed tory, was in the year 1700 chofen fpeaker of the houfe of commons, and was continued in the fame upon the acceffion of Queen ANNE, the year enfuing. BOLINGEROKE had all along been bred up, as was before obferved, among the differences, his friends leaned to that perfuation, and all his connections were in the whig intereft. However, either from principle, or from perceiving the tory party party to be then gaining ground, while the whigs were declining, he foon changed his connections, and joined himfelf to HARLEY, for whom he then had the greateft efteem : nor did he bring him his vote alone, but his opinion ; which even before the end of his firft feffion he rendered very confiderable, the houfe perceiving even in fo young a fpeaker the greateft eloquence, united with the profoundeft difcernment. The year following he was again chofen anew for the fame borough, and perfevered in his former attachments, by which he gained fuch an authority and influence in the houfe, that it was thought proper to reward his merit ; and on the 10th of April 1704, he was appointed fecretary at war, and of the marines, his friend HARLEY having a little before been made fecretary of flate.

The tory party being thus established in power, it may eafily be fuppofed that every method would be used to de-press the whig interest, and to prevent it from rifing; yet fo much justice was done even to merit in an enemy, that the Duke of MARLEOROUGH, who might be confidered as at the head of the oppofite party, was fupplied with all the neceffaries for carrying on the war in Flanders with vigour; and it is remarkable, that the greatest events of his campaigns, fuch as the battles of Blenheim and Ramillies, and feveral glorious attempts made by the duke to fhorten the war by some decisive action, fell out while BOLINGBROKE was fecretary at war. In fact, he was a fincere admirer of that great general, and avowed it upon all occafions to the laft moment of his life : he knew his faults, he admired his virtrues, and had the boaft of being inftrumental in giving lustre to those triumphs, by which his own power was in. a manner overthrown.

As the affairs of the nation were then in as fluctuating a flate as at prefent, HARLEY, after maintaining the lead for above three years, was in his turn obliged to fubmit to the whigs, who once more became the prevailing party, and he was compelled to refign the feals. The friendship between him and BOLINGBROKE feems at this time to have been fincere and difinterested; for the latter chose to follow his fortune, and the next day refigned his employments in the administration, following his friend's example, and fetting an example at once of integrity and moderation. As an instance of this, when his coadjutors the tories were for carrying a violent measure in the house of commons, in order to bring the prince's SOPHIA into England, BOLINGBROKE fo artfully opposed it, that it dropt without a debate. For this his moderation was praifed, but perhaps at the expence of his fagacity.

FOR fome time the whigs feemed to have gained a complete triumph, and upon the election of a new parliament, in the year 1708, BOLINGBROKE was not returned. The interval which followed of above two years, he employed in the fevereft fludy; and this reclufe period he ever after ufed to confider as the most active and ferviceable of his whole life. But his retirement was foon interrupted, by the prevailing of his party once more; for the whig parliament being diffolved in the year 1710, he was again chosen, and HARLEY being made chancellor, and under-treasfurer of the exchequer, the important post of fecretary of flate was given to our author, in which he discovered a degree of genius and affiduity, that perhaps have never been known to be united in one perfon to the fame degree.

THE English annals scarce produce a more trying juncture, or that required fuch various abilities to regulate. He was then placed in a fphere, where he was obliged to conduct the machine of flate, flruggling with a thoufand various calamities : a defperate and enraged party, whose characteristic it has ever been to bear none in power but themfelves; a war conducted by an able general, his profeffed opponent, and whole victories only tended to render him every day more formidable ; a foreign enemy, possessed of endless resources, and feeming to gather ftrength from every defeat ; an infidious alliance, that wanted only to gain the advantages of victory, without contributing to the expences of the combat; a weak declining miftrefs, that was led by every report, and feemed ready to liften to whatever was faid against him; still more, a gloomy, indolent, and fufpicious collegue, that envied his power, and hated him for his abilities : thefe were a part of the difficulties, that BOLINGBROKE had to struggle with in office, and under which he was to conduct the treaty of peace of Utrecht, which was confidered as one of the most complicated negotiations that hiftory can afford. But nothing feemed too great for his abilities and industry; he fet himfelf to the undertaking with fpirit : he began to pave the way to the intended treaty, by making the people difcontented at the continuance of the war; for this purpose he employed himfelf in drawing up accurate computations of the numbers of our own men, and that of foreigners employed in its destructive progress. He even wrote in the Examiners, and other periodical papers of the times, shewing how much of the burden refted upon England, and how little was fustained by those who falsly boasted their alliance. By these means, and after much debate in the house of commons, the queen received a petition from parliament, fhewing the hardships the allies had put upon England in carry-Vol. I. Ь ing

ing on this war, and confequently how neceffary it was to apply relief to fo ill-judged a connexion. It may be eafily supposed that the Dutch, against whom this petition was chiefly levelled, did all that was in their power to oppofe it; many of the foreign courts alfo, with whom we had any transactions, were continually at work to defeat the minister's intentions. Memorial was delivered after memorial; the people of England, the parliament, and all Europe were made acquainted with the injustice and the dangers of such a proceeding : however BOLINGBROKE went on with fteadinefs and refolution, and although the attacks of his enemies at home might have been deemed fufficient to employ his attention, yet he was obliged at the fame time that he furnished materials to the prefs in London, to furnish instructions to all our ministers and ambassadors abroad, who would do nothing but in purfuance of his directions. As an orator, in the fenate he exerted all his eloquence, he ftated all the great points that were brought before the house, he answered the objections that were made by the leaders of the oppofition; and all this with fuch fuccefs, that even his enemies while they opposed his power, acknowledged his abilities. Indeed fuch were the difficulties he had to encounter, that we find him acknowledging himfelf fome years after, that he never looked back on this great event paffed as it was, without a fecret emotion of mind, when he compared the vaftness of the undertaking, and the importance of the fuccess, with the means employed to bring it about, and with those which were employed to frustrate his intentions.

WHILE he was thus industriously employed, he was not without the rewards that deferved to follow fuch abilities, joined to fo much affiduity. In July 1712, he was created Baron ST. JOHN, of Lidyard Tregoze, in Wiltschire, and Vifcount

count Bolingeroke, by the laft of which titles he is now generally known, and is likely to be talked of by pofterity: he was alfo the fame year appointed lord lieutenant of the county of Effex. By the titles of TREGOZE and Boling-BROKE, he united the honours of the elder and younger branch of his family; and thus transmitted into one channel, the opposing interests of two races, that had been diffinguished one for their loyalty to king CHARLES I. the other for their attachment to the parliament that opposed him. It was afterwards his boast, that he stered clear of the extremes for which his ancestors had been diffinguished, having kept the strenge of the one, and acknowledged the fubordination that diffinguished the other.

BOLINGBROKE being thus raifed very near the fummit of power, began to perceive more nearly the defects of him who was placed there. He now began to find that lord OXFORD, whole party he had followed, and whole perfon he had efteemed, was by no means fo able or fo industrious as he fuppofed him to be. He now began from his heart to renounce the friendship which he once had for his coadjutor; he began to imagine him treacherous, mean, indolent, and invidious; he even began to afcribe his own promotion to Oxford's hatred, and to fuppofe that he was fent up to the house of lords, only to render him contemptible. These fuspicions were partly true, and partly fuggefted by BOLING-BROKE's own ambition; being fenfible of his own fuperior importance and capacity, he could not bear to fee another take the lead in public affairs, when he knew they owed their chief fuccefs to his own management. Whatever might have been his motives, whether of contempt, hatred, or ambition, it is certain an irreconcileable breach began between these two leaders of their party ; their mutual hatred was fo great, that even their own common intereft, the vigour of their negociations, and the fafety of their friends, were entirely factificed to it. It was in vain that SWIFT, who was admitted into their counfels, urged the unreafonable impropriety of their difputes; that while they were thus at variance within the walls, the enemy were making irreparable breaches without. BOLINGBROKE's antipathy was fo great, that even fuccefs would have been hateful to him, if lord OXFORD were to be a partner. He abhorred him to that degree, that he could not bear to be joined with him in any cafe; and even fome time after, when the lives of both were aimed at, he could not think of concerting measures with him for their mutual fafety, preferring even death itfelf to the appearance of a temporary friendship.

NOTHING could have been more weak and injudicious, than their mutual animofities at this juncture; and it may be afferted with truth, that men who were unable to fupprefs or conceal their refertments upon fuch a trying occafion, were unfit to take the lead in any meafures, be their induftry or their abilities ever fo great. In fact, their diffentions were foon found to involve not only them, but their party in utter ruin; their hopes had for fome time been declining, the whigs were daily gaining ground, and the queen's death foon after totally deftroyed all their fchemes with their power.

UPON the acceffion of GEORGE I. to the throne, dangers began to threaten the late miniftry on every fide; whether they had really intentions of bringing in the Pretender, or whether the whigs made it a pretext for deftroying them, is uncertain; but the king very foon began to fhew, that they were to expect neither favour nor mercy at his hands. Upon his his landing at Geeenwich, when the court came to wait upon him, and lord OXFORD among the number, he fludioufly avoided taking any notice of him, and teftified his refentment by the careffes he bestowed upon the members of the opposite faction. A regency had been some time before appointed to govern the kingdom, and ADDISON was made fe-cretary. BOLINGBROKE still maintained his place of state fecretary, but subject to the contempt of the great, and the infults of the mean. The first step taken by them to mortify him, was to order all letters and packets directed to the fecretary of state, to be fent to Mr. Addison; fo that Bo-LINGBROKE was in fact removed from his office, that is, the execution of it, in two days after the queen's death. But this was not the worft, for his mortifications were continually heightened, by the daily humiliation of waiting at the door of the apartment where the regency fat, with a bag in his hand, and being all the time, as it were, on purpofe, expofed to the infolence of those who were tempted by their natural malevolence, or who expected to make their court to those in power by abusing him.

UPON this fudden turn of fortune, when the feals were taken from him, he went into the country, and having received a meffage from court, to be prefent when the feal was taken from the door of the fecretary's office, he excufed himfelf, alledging, that fo triffing a ceremony might as well be performed by one of the under fecretaries, but at the fame time requefted the honour of kifling the king's hand, to whom he teffified the utmost fubmisfion. This request however was rejected with difdain; the king had been taught to regard him as an enemy, and threw himfelf entirely on the whigs for fafety and protection.

THE new parliament, mostly composed of whigs, met the 17th of March; and in the king's fpeech from the throne, many inflaming hints were given, and many methods of vio-lence chalked out to the two houfes. "The first steps, " (fays lord BOLINGBROKE, fpeaking on this occasion) in both " were perfectly answerable; and, to the shame of the peer-"were perfectly aniwerable; and, to the fname of the peer-"age be it fpoken, I faw at that time feveral lords concur, to condemn in one general vote, all that they had approv-ed in a former parliament, by many particular refolu-tions. Among feveral bloody refolutions propofed and agitated at this time, the refolution of impeaching me of high treafon was taken; and I took that of leaving Eng-land, not in a panic terror, improved by the artifices of the " duke of MARLBOROUGH, whom I knew even at that time " too well to act by his advice or information, in any cafe, " but on fuch grounds as the proceedings which foon fol-" lowed fufficiently justified, and fuch as I have never re-" pented building upon. Those who blamed it in the first " heat, were foon after obliged to change their language : " for what other refolution could I take? The method of " profecution defigned against me, would have put me out " of a condition immediately to act for myfelf, or to ferve " those who were less exposed than me, but who were how-" ever in danger. On the other hand, how few were there " on whofe affiftance I could depend, or to whom I would " even in these circumstances be obliged. The ferment in " the nation was wrought up to a confiderable height; but there was at that time no reafon to expect that it could in-" fluence the proceedings in parliament, in favour of those " who fhould be accufed : left to its own movement, it was " much more proper to quicken than flacken the profecu-" tions; and who was there to guide its motions? The to-" ries, who had been true to one another to the laft, were a " handful,

" handful, and no great vigour could be expected from " them : the whimficals, disappointed of the figure which " they hoped to make, began indeed to join their old friends. " One of the principal among them, namely, the earl of " ANGLESEA, was fo very good as to confels to me, that if " the court had called the fervants of the late queen to ac-" count, and flopped there, he must have confidered him-" felf as a judge, and acted according to his confcience, on " what should have appeared to him : but that war had been " declared to the whole tory party, and that now the flate " of things were altered. This difcourse needed no com-" mentary, and proved to me, that I had never erred in the " judgment I made of this fet of men. Could I then re-" folve to be obliged to them, or to fuffer with OXFORD ? As " much as I still was heated by the difputes, in which I had " been all my life engaged against the whigs, I would fooner " have chosen to owe my fecurity to their indulgence, than " to the affiftance of the whimficals : but I thought banifh-" ment, with all her train of evils, preferable to either."

SUCH was the miferable fituation to which he was reduced upon this occafion; of all the number of his former flatterers and dependants, fcarce one was found remaining. Every hour brought frefh reports of his alarming fituation, and the dangers which threatened him and his party on all fides. PRIOR, who had been employed in negociating the treaty of Utrecht, was come over to Dover, and had promifed to reveal all he knew. The duke of MARLBOROUGH planted his creatures round his lordfhip, who artfully endeavoured to increafe the danger; and an impeachment was actually preparing in which he was accufed of high treafon. It argued therefore no great degree of timidity in his lordfhip, to take the firft opportunity to withdraw from danger, and

LIFE OF HENRY

to fuffer the first boilings of popular animolity, to quench the flame that had been raifed against him : accordingly, having made a gallant shew of despising the machinations against him, having appeared in a very unconcerned manner at the playhouse in Drury-lane, and having bespoke another play for the night ensuing; having subscribed to a new opera that was to be acted fome time after, and talked of making an elaborate defence, he went off that fame night in difguise to Dover, as a fervant to LE VIGNE, a messer belonging to the French king; and there one WILLIAM MORGAN, who had been a captain in General HILL's regiment of dragoons, hired a vessel, and carried him over to Calais, where the governor attended him in his coach, and carried him to his house with all possible distinction.

THE news of lord BOLINGEROKE's flight was foon known over the whole town; and the next day, a letter from him to lord LANSDOWNE, was handed about in print, to the following effect.

" My Lord,

" LEFT the town fo abruptly, that I had no time to take leave of you or any of my friends. You will excufe me, when you know that I had certain and repeated informations, from fome who are in the fecret of affairs, that a refolution was taken by thofe who have power to execute it, to purfue me to the fcaffold. My blood was to have been the cement of a new alliance, nor could my innocence be any fecurity, after it had once been demanded from abroad, and refolved on at home, that it was neceffary to cut me off. Had there been the leaft reafon to hope for a fair and open trial, after having been s

" already prejudged unheard by two houses of parliament, " I should not have declined the strictest examination. I " challenge the most inveterate of my enemies to produce " any one inftance of a criminal correspondence, or the least " corruption of any part of the administration in which " I was concerned. If my zeal for the honour and dignity " of my royal miftrefs, and the true intereft of my country, " has any where transported me to let flip a warm or un-" guarded expression, I hope the most favorable interpreta-" tion will be put upon it. It is a comfort that will re-" main with me in all my misfortunes, that I ferved her " majefty faithfully and dutifully, in that especially which " fhe had most at heart, relieving her people from a bloody " and expensive war, and that I have also been too much " an Englishman, to facrifice the interest of my country to " any foreign ally; and it is for this crime only that I am " now driven from thence. You shall hear more at large " from me fhortly."

No fooner was it univerfally known that he was retired to France, than his flight was conftrued into a proof of his guilt; and his enemies accordingly fet about driving on his impeachment with redoubled alacrity. Mr. afterwards Sir ROBERT WALPOLE, who had fuffered a good deal by his attachment to the whig intereft during the former reign, now undertook to bring in and conduct the charge againft him in the houfe of commons. His impeachment confifted of fix articles, which WALPOLE read to the houfe, in fubftance as follows. Firft, That whereas the lord BOLINGBROKE had affured the Dutch minifters, that the queen his miftrefs would make no peace but in concert with them, yet he Vol. I. had fent Mr. PRIOR to France, that fame year, with propofals for a treaty of peace with that monarch, without the confent of the allies. Secondly, That he advifed and promoted the making a feparate treaty of convention with France, which was figned in September. Thirdly, That he disclosed to M. MESNAGER, the French minister at London, this convention, which was the preliminary inftructions to her majesty's plenipotentiaries at Utrecht. Fourthly, That her majesty's final instructions to her plenipotentiaries, were disclosed by him to the abbot GUALTIER, who was an emiffary of France. Fifthly, That he disclosed to the French the manner how Tournay in Flanders might be gained by them. And laftly, That he advifed and promoted the yielding up Spain and the Weft-Indies to the duke of ANJOU, then an enemy to her majefty. These were urged by WAL-POLE with great vehemence, and aggravated with all the eloquence of which he was mafter. He challenged any perfon in behalf of the accufed, and afferted, that to vindicate, were in a manner to fhare his guilt. In this universal confternation of the tory party, none was for fome time feen to ftir; but at length General Ross, who had received favors from his lordship, boldly stood up, and faid he wondered that no man more capable was found to appear in defence of the accused. However, in attempting to proceed, he hefitated fo much that he was obliged to fit down, obferving, that he would referve what he had to fay to another opportunity. It may eafily be fuppofed, that the whigs found no great difficulty in passing the vote for his impeachment through the house of commons. It was brought into that house on the 10th of June 1715, it was sent up to the house of lords on the 6th of August ensuing, and in consequence of which he was attainted by them of high treafon on the 10th of September. Nothing could be more unjust -11 than

BOLINGBROKE thus finding all hopes cut off at home, began to think of improving his wretched fortune upon the continent. He had left England with a very fmall fortune, and his attainder totally cut off all refources for the future. In this depreffed fituation, he began to liften to fome propofals which were made him by the Pretender, who was then refiding at Barr, in France, and who was defirous of admitting BOLINGBROKE into his fecret councils. A propofal of this nature had been made him fhortly after his arrival at Paris, and before his attainder at home; but while he had yet any hopes of fucceeding in England, he abfolutely refufed, and made the beft applications his ruined fortune would permit, to prevent the extremity of his profecution.

HE had for some time waited for an opportunity of determining himfelf, even after he found it vain to think of making his peace at home. He let his Jacobite friends in England know that they had but to command him, and he was ready to venture in their fervice the little all that remained, as frankly as he had exposed all that was gone. At length, (fays he, talking of himfelf) these commands came, and were executed in the following manner. The perfon who was fent to me, arrived in the beginning of July 1715, at the place I had retired to in Dauphine. He spoke in the name of all the friends whose authority could influence me; and he brought me word that Scotland was not only ready to take arms, but under some fort of diffatisfaction to be withheld from beginning: that in England the people were exasperated against the government to such a degree, that far from wanting to be encouraged, they could not be reftrain-

ed from infulting it on every occasion; that the whole tory party was become avowedly Jacobites; that many officers of the army, and the majority of the foldiers, were well affected to the cause; that the city of London was ready to rife, and that the enterprizes for feizing of feveral places, were ripe for execution; in a word, that most of the principal tories were in a concert with the duke of ORMOND: for I had preffed particularly to be informed whether his grace acted alone, or if not, who were his council; and that the others were fo disposed, that there remained no doubt of their joining as foon as the first blow should be struck. He added, that my friends were a little furprifed, to obferve that I lay neuter in fuch a conjuncture. He reprefented to me the danger I ran, of being prevented by people of all fides from having the merit of engaging early in this enterprize, and how unaccountable it would be for a man, impeached and attainted under the prefent government, to take no fhare in bringing about a revolution fo near at hand, and fo certain. He intreated that I would defer no longer to join the Chevalier, to advife and affift in carrying on his affairs, and to follicit and negotiate at the court of France, where my friends imagined that I should not fail to meet a favourable reception, and from whence they made no doubt of receiving affistance in a fituation of affairs fo critical, fo unexpected, and fo promifing. He concluded, by giving me a letter from the Pretender, whom he had feen in his way tome, in which I was preffed to repair without lofs of time to-Comercy; and this inftance was grounded on the meffagewhich the bearer of the letter had brought me from England. In the progrefs of the converfation with the meffenger, he related a number of facts, which fatisfied me as to the general difposition of the people; but he gave me little satisfaction as to the meafures taken to improve this disposition, for driving driving the business on with vigour, if it tended to a revolution, or for fupporting it to advantage if it fpun into a war. When I queftioned him concerning feveral perfons whofe difinclination to the government admitted no doubt, and whofe names, quality, and experience were very effential to the fuccess of the undertaking; he owned to me that they kept a great referve, and did at most but encourage others to act by general and dark expressions. I received this account and this fummons ill in my bed; yet important as the matter was, a few minutes ferved to determine me. The circumstances wanting to form a reasonable inducement to engage, did not excuse me; but the smart of a bill of attainder tingled in every vein, and I looked on my party to be under oppression, and to call for my assistance. Besides which, I confidered first that I should be certainly informed, when I conferred with the Chevalier, of many particulars unknown to this gentleman; for I did not imagine that the English could be so near to take up arms as he represented them to be, on no other foundation than that which he expofed.

In this manner having for fome time debated with himfelf, and taken his refolution, he loft no time in repairing to the Pretender at Comercy, and took the feals of that nominal king, as he had formerly those of his potent mistrefs. But this was a terrible falling off indeed; and the very first conversation he had with this weak projector, gave him the most unfavourable expectations of future fucces. He talked to me (fays his lordship) like a man who expected every moment to fet out for England or Scotland, but who did not very well know for which; and when he entered into the particulars of his affairs, I found, that concerning the former, he had nothing more circumftantial or positive to go upon, upon, than what I have already related. But the Duke of ORMOND had been for fome time, I cannot fay how long, engaged with the Chevalier : he had taken the direction of this whole affair, as far as it related to England, upon himfelf, and had received a commission for this purpose, which contained the most ample powers that could be given. But still, however, all was unfettled, undetermined, and ill understood. The duke had asked from France a small body of forces, a fum of money, and a quantity of ammunition; but to the first part of the request he received a flat denial, but was made to hope that fome arms and fome ammunition might be given. This was but a very gloomy profpect; yet hope fwelled the depreffed party fo high that they talked of nothing lefs than an inftant and ready revolution. It was their interest to be fecret and industrious; but, rendered fanguine by their passions, they made no doubt of fubverting a government with which they were angry, and gave as great an alarm, as would have been imprudent at the eve of a general infurrection.

SUCH was the flate of things, when BOLINGERORE arrived to take up his new office at Comercy; and although he faw the deplorable flate of the party with which he was embarked, yet he refolved to give his affairs the beft complection he was able, and fet out for Paris, in order to procure from that court the neceffary fuccours for his new mafter's invafion of England. But his reception and negotiations at Paris, were flil more unpromifing than those at Comercy, and nothing but absolute infatuation feemed to dictate every measure taken by the party. He there found a multitude of people at work, and every one doing what feemed good in his own eyes; no fubordination, no order, no concert. The Jacobites had wrought one another up to look

look upon the fuccess of the present defigns, as infallible : every meeting-house which the populace demolished, as he himfelf fays, every little drunken riot which happened, ferved to confirm them in these fanguine expectations; and there was hardly one among them who would lofe the air of contributing by his intrigues to the reftoration, which he took for granted would be brought about in a few weeks. Care and hope, fays our author very humouroufly, fate on every bufy Irifh face; those who could read and write, had letters to fhew, and those who had not arrived to this pitch of erudition, had their fecrets to whifper. No fex was excluded from this ministry; FANNY OGLETHORPE kept her corner in it, and OLIVE TRANT, a woman of the fame mixed reputation, was the great wheel of this political machine. The ridiculous correspondence was carried on with England by people of like importance, and who were bufy in founding the alarm in the ears of an enemy, whom it was their interest to furprife. By these means, as he himfelf continues to inform us, the government of England was put on its guard, fo that before he came to Paris, what was doing had been discovered. The little armament made at Havre de Grace, which furnished the only means to the Pretender of landing on the coafts of Britain, and which had exhausted the treasury of St. Germains, was talked of publicly. The Earl of STAIR, the English minister at that city, very foon difcovered its deftination, and all the particulars of the intended invafion; the names of the perfons from whom fupplies came, and who were particularly active in the defign, were whilpered about at tea-tables and coffee houses. In fhort, what by the indifcretion of the projectors, what by the private interefts and ambitious views of the French, the most private transactions came to light; and fuch of the more prudent plotters, who supposed that they had trusted their: τ.

their heads to the keeping of one or two friends, were in reality at the mercy of numbers. Into fuch company, exclaims our noble writer, was I fallen for my fins. Still, however, he went on, steering in the wide ocean without a compass, till the death of LEWIS XIV. and the arrival of the Duke of ORMOND at Paris, rendered all his endeavours abortive : yet notwithstanding these unfavourable circumftances, he still continued to difpatch feveral meffages and directions for England, to which he received very evafive and ambiguous answers. Among the number of these, he drew up a paper at Chaville, in concert with the Duke of OR-MOND, marshal BERWICK, and DE TORCY, which was fent to England just before the death of the King of France, reprefenting that France could not answer the demands of their memorial, and praying directions what to do. A reply to this came to him through the French fecretary of state, wherein they declared themfelves unable to fay any thing, till they faw what turn affairs would take on the death of the king, which had reached their ears. Upon another occafion, a meffage coming from Scotland to prefs the Chevalier to haften their rifing, he difpatched a meffenger to London to the Earl of MAR, to tell him that the concurrence of England in the infurrection, was ardently wished and expected : but inftead of that nobleman's waiting for inftructions, he had already gone into the Highlands, and had there actually put himfelf at the head of his clans. After this, in concert with the Duke of ORMOND, he difpatched one Mr. HAMILTON, who got all the papers by heart, for fear of a miscarriage, to their friends in England, to inform them, that though the Chevalier destitute of fuccour, and all reasonable hopes of WS it, yet he would land as they pleafed in England or Scotland, at a minute's warning; and therefore they might rife imme-immediately after they had fent difpatches to him. To this meffage Mr. HAMILTON returned very foon, with an anfwer given by lord LANSDOWNE, in the name of all the perfons privy to the fecret, that fince affairs grew daily worfe, and would not mend by delay, the malecontents in England had refolved to declare immediately, and would be ready to join the duke of ORMOND on his landing; adding, that his perfon would be as fafe in England as in Scotland, and that in every other respect it was better he should land in England; that they had used their utmost endeavours, and hoped the western counties would be in a good posture to receive him, and that he should land as near as possible to Plymouth. With these affurances the duke embarked, though he had heard before of the feizure of many of his most zealous adherents, of the dispersion of many more, and the consternation of all; fo that upon his arrival at Plymouth, finding nothing in readinefs, he returned to Britany. In thefe circumstances the Pretender himfelf fent to have a veffel got ready for him at Dunkirk, in which he went to Scotland, leaving lord BOLINGBROKE all this while at Paris, to try if by any means fome affiftance might not be procured, without which all hopes of fuccefs were at an end. It was during his negotiation upon this miserable proceeding, that he was fent for by Mrs. TRANT, (a woman who had fome time before ingratiated herfelf with the regent of France, by fupplying him with miftreffes from England) to a little house in the Bois de Boulogne, where she lived with mademoifelle CHAUS-SERY, an old fuperannuated waiting-woman belonging to the regent. By these he was acquainted with the measures they had taken for the fervice of the duke of ORMOND ; although BOLINGBROKE, who was actual fecretary to the negotiation, had never been admitted to a confidence in their fecrets. He was therefore a little furprifed, at finding fuch mean VOL. I. agents agents employed without his privity, and very foon found them utterly unequal to the tafk. He quickly therefore withdrew himfelf from fuch wretched auxiliaries, and the regent himfelf feemed pleafed at his defection.

In the mean time the Pretender fet fail from Dunkirk for Scotland, and though BOLINGBROKE had all along perceived that his caufe was hopelefs and his projects ill defigned; although he had met with nothing but opposition and difappointment in his fervice, yet he confidered that this of all others was the time he could not be permitted to relax in the caufe. He now therefore neglected no means, forgot no argument which his understanding could suggest, in applying to the court of France: but his fuccefs was not anfwerable to his industry. The king of France, not able to furnish the Pretender with money himself, had writ some time before his death to his grandfon the king of Spain, and had obtained from him a promise of forty thousand crowns. A fmall part of this fum had been received by the queen's treafurer at St. Germains, and had been fent to Scotland, or employed to defray the expences which were daily making on the coaft : at the fame time BOLINGBROKE preffed the Spanifh ambaffador at Paris, and folicited the minister at the court of Spain. He took care to have a number of officers picked out of the Irish troops which ferve in France, gave them their routes, and fent a ship to receive and transport them to Scotland. Still however the money came in fo flowly, and in fuch trifling fums, that it turned to little account ; and the officers were on their way to the Pretender. At the fame time he formed a defign of engaging French privateers, in the expedition, that were to have carried whatever fhould be neceffary to fend to any part of Britain in their first voyage, and then to cruize under the Pretender's commission. He had had actually agreed for fome, and had it in his power to have made the fame bargain with others: Sweden on one fide, and Scotland on the other, could have afforded them retreats; and if the war had been kept up in any part of the mountains, this armament would have been of the utmost advantage. But all his projects and negociations failed, by the Pretender's precipitate return, who was not above fix weeks in his expedition, and flew out of Scotland even before all had been tried in his defence.

THE expedition being in this manner totally defeated, Bo-LINGBROKE now began to think that it was his duty as well as interest, to fave the poor remains of the disappointed party. He never had any great opinion of the Pretender's fuccess before he set off; but when this adventurer had taken the last step which it was in his power to make, our fecretary then refolved to fuffer neither him, nor the Scotch, to be any longer bubbles of their own credulity, and of the scandalous artifices of the French court. In a conversation he had with the marshal DE HUXELLES, he took occasion to declare, that he would not be the inftrument of amufing the Scotch ; and fince he was able to do them no other fervice, he would at leaft inform them of what little dependence they might place upon affiftance from France. He added, that he would fend them veffels, which with those already on the coaft of Scotland, might ferve to bring off the Pretender, the earl of MAR, and as many others as possible. The marshal approved his refolution, and advifed him to execute it as the only thing which was left to do; but in the mean time the Pretender landed at Graveline, and gave orders to ftop all veffels bound on his account to Scotland ; and BOLINGEROKE faw him the morning after his arrival at St. Germans, and he received him with open arms.

XXVIII

As it was the fecretary's bufinefs, as foon as BOLINGBROKE heard of his return, he went to acquaint the French court with it, when it was recommended to him to advife the Pretender to proceed to Bar with all poffible diligence; and in this measure BOLINGBROKE entirely concurred. But the Pretender himfelf was in no fuch hafte, he had a mind to ftay fome time at St. Germains, and in the neighburhood of Paris, and to have a private meeting with the regent : he accordingly fent BOLINGBROKE to folicit this meeting, who exerted all his influence in the negociation. He wrote and spoke to the marshal DE HUXELLES, who answered him by word of mouth and by letters, refufing him by both, and affuring him that the regent faid the things which were afked were puerilities, and fwore he would not fee him. The fecretary, no ways difpleafed with his ill fuccefs, returned with this answer to his master, who acquiesced in this determination, and declared he would inftantly fet out for Lorrain, at the fame time affuring BOLINGBROKE of his firm reliance on his integrity.

HOWEVER the Pretender, instead of taking post for Lorrain, as he had promifed, went to a little house in the Bois de Boulogne, where his female ministers refided, and there continued for feveral days, feeing the Spanish and Swedish ministers, and even the regent himself. It might have been in thefe interviews that he was fet against his new fecretary, and taught to believe that he had been remifs in his duty, and falfe to his truft : be this as it will, a few days after, the duke of ORMOND came to fee BOLINGBROKE, and having first prepared him for the furprife, put into his hands a note directed to the duke, and a little fcrip of paper directed to the fecretary; they were both in the Pretender's hand-writing, and dated as if written by him on his way to Lorrain : but in

in this BOLINGBROKE was not to be deceived, who knew the place of his prefent refidence. In one of these papers the Pretender declared that he had no further occasion for the fecretary's fervice, and the other was an order to him to give up the papers in his office ; all which he observes, might have been contained in a letter-cafe of a moderate fize. He gave the duke the feals, and fome papers which he could readily come at; but for fome others, in which there were feveral infinuations under the Pretender's own hand, reflecting upon the duke himfelf, these he took care to convey by a fase hand, fince it would have been very improper that the duke should have feen them. As he thus gave up without fcruple all the papers which remained in his hands, because he was determined never to make use of them, fo he declares he took a fecret pride in never asking for those of his own which were in the Pretender's hands; contenting himfelf with making the duke understand, how little need there was to get rid of a man in this manner, who only wanted an opportunity to get rid of the Pretender and his caufe. In fact, if we furvey the measures taken on the one fide, and the abilities of the man on the other, it will not appear any way wonderful that: he should be difgusted with a party, who had neither principle to give a foundation to their hopes, union to advance: them, or abilities to put them in motion.

BOLINGEROKE being thus difinified from the Pretender'ss fervice, he fuppofed that he had got rid of the trouble and the ignominy of fo mean an employment at the fame time; but he was miftaken: he was no fooner rejected from the office, than articles of impeachment were preferred againft him, in the fame manner as he had before been impeached in England, though not with fuch effectual injury to his perforand fortune. The articles of his impeachment by the Pretender tender were branched out into feven heads, in which he was acculed of treachery, incapacity, and neglect. The first was, That he was never to be found by those who came to him about bufiness; and if by chance or stratagem they got hold of him, he affected being in an hurry, and by putting them off to another time, still avoided giving them any answer. The fecond was, That the earl of MAR complained by fix different messengers, at different times, before the Chevalier came from Dunkirk, of his being in want of arms and ammunition, and prayed a fpeedy relief; and though the things demanded were in my lord's power, there was not fo much as one pound of powder in any of the ships, which by his lordship's directions parted from France. Thirdly, The Pretender himself, after his arrival, sent general HAMILTON to inform him, that his want of arms and ammunition was fuch, that he should be obliged to leave Scotland, unless he received speedy relief : yet lord BOLINGBROKE amused Mr. HAMILTON twelve days together, and did not introduce him to any of the French ministers, tho' he was referred to them for a particular account of affairs; or fo much as communicated his letters to the queen, or any body elfe. Fourthly, The count DE CASTEL BLANCO had for feveral months, at Havre, a confiderable quantity of arms and ammunition, and did daily afk his lordship's orders how to dispose of them, but never got any inftructions. Fifthly, The Pretender's friends at the French court, had for some time past no very good opinion of his lordship's integrity, and a very bad one of his difcretion. Sixthly, At a time when many merchants in France would have carried privately any quantity of arms and ammunition into Scotland, his lordship defired a public order for the embarkation, which being a thing not to be granted, is faid to have been done in order to urge a denial. Laftly, The Pretender wrote to his lordship by every occafion fion after his arrival in Scotland; and tho' there were many opportunities of writing in return, yet from the time he landed there, to the day he left it, he never received any letter from his lordfhip. Such were the articles, by a very extraordinary reverfe of fortune, preferred againft lord BOLING-BROKE, in lefs than a year after fimilar articles were drawn up againft him by the oppofite party at home. It is not eafy to find out what he could have done, thus to difoblige all fides; but he had learned by this time, to make out happinefs from the confcioufnefs of his own defigns, and to confider all the reft of mankind as uniting in a faction to opprefs virtue.

But though it was mortifying to be thus rejected on both fides, yet he was not remifs in vindicating himfelf from all. Against these articles of impeachment, therefore, he drew up an elaborate anfwer, in which he vindicates himfelf with great plaufibility. He had long, as he affures, wifhed to leave the Pretender's fervice, but was entirely at a lofs how to conduct himfelf in fo difficult a refignation ; but at length, fays he, the Pretender and his council disposed of things better for me than I could have done for myfelf. I had refolved, on his return from Scotland, to follow him till his refidence should be fixed somewhere ; after which, having ferved the tories in this, which I looked upon as their last struggle for power, and having continued to act in the Pretender's affairs, till the end of the term for which I embarked with him, I fhould have effected myfelf to be at liberty, and fhould, in the civileft manner I was able, have taken my leave of him. Had we parted thus, I should have remained in a very strange fituation all the reft of my life; on one fide, he would have thought that he had a right on any future occasion to call me out of my retreat, the tories would probably have thought the 7

xxxii LIFE OF HENRY

the fame thing, my refolution was taken to refufe them both, and I forefaw that both would condemn me : on the other fide, the confideration of his having kept measures with me, joined to that of having once openly declared for him, would have created a point of honour by which I should have been tied down, not only from ever engaging against him, but also from making my peace at home. The Pretender cut this Gordian knot as funder at one blow; he broke the links of that chain which former engagements had fastened on me, and gave me a right to esteem myself as free from all obligations of keeping measures with him, as I should have continued if I had never engaged in his interest.

It is not to be fuppofed that one fo very delicate to preferve his honour, would previoufly have bafely betrayed his employer: a man confcious of acting fo infamous a part, would have undertaken no defence, but let the accusations, which could not materially affect him, blow over, and wait for the calm that was to fucceed in tranquility. He appeals to all the ministers with whom he transacted business, for the integrity of his proceedings at that juncture; and had he been really guilty, when he opposed the ministry here after his return, they would not have failed to brand and detect his duplicity. The truth is, that he perhaps was the most difinterested minister at that time in the Pretender's court; as he had fpent great fums of his own money in his fervice, and never would be obliged to him for a farthing, in which cafe he believes that he was fingle. His integrity is much lefs impeachable on this occasion than his ambition; for all the steps he took may be fairly ascribed to his displeasure at having the duke of ORMOND and the earl of MAR treated more confidentially than himfelf. It was his aim always to beforemost in every administration, and he could not bear

AT all periods of his exile, he still looked towards home with fecret regret; and had taken every opportunity to ap-ply to those in power, either to fosten his profecutions, or leffen the number of his enemies at home. In accepting his office under the Pretender, he made it a condition to be at liberty to quit the post whenever he should think proper; and being now difgracefully difmiffed, he turned his mind entirely towards making his peace in England, and employing all the unfortunate experience he had acquired to undeceive his tory friends, and to promote the union and quiet of his native country. It was not a little favourable to his hopes, that about this time, though unknown to him, the Earl of STAIR, ambaffador to the French court, had received full power to treat with him whilft he was engaged with the Pretender; but yet had never made him any propofals, which might be confidered as the groffeft outrage. But when the breach with the Pretender was univerfally known, the earl fent one monfieur SALUDIN, a gentleman of Geneva, to lord BOLINGBROKE, to communicate to him his majefty King GEORGE's favourable disposition to grant him a pardon, and his own earnest defire to ferve him as far as he was able. This was an offer by much too advantageous for BOLINGBROKE in his wretched circumstances to refufe; he embraced it, as became him to do, with all poslible fenfe of the king's goodneis, and of the ambassador's friendship. They had frequent conferences shortly after upon the subject. The turn which the English minifiry gave the matter, was to enter into a treaty to reverse his attainder, and to stipulate the conditions on which this act of grace should be granted him : but Vol. I. this e this method of negociation he would by no means fubmit to; the notion of a treaty fhocked him, and he refolved never to be reftored, rather than go that way to work. Accordingly he opened himfelf without any referve to Lord STAIR, and told him, that he looked upon himfelf obliged in honour and conscience, to undeceive his friends in England, both as to the state of foreign affairs, as to the management of the Jacobite interest abroad, and as to the characters of the perfons; in every one of which points he knew them to be most grossly and most dangerously deluded. He observed, that the treatment he had received from the Pretender and his adherents, would juftify him to the world in doing this. That if he remained in exile all his life, that he might be affured that he would never have more to do with the Jacobite cause; and that if he were restored, he would give it an effectual blow, in making that apology which the Pretender had put him under a neceffity of making. That in doing this, he flattered himfelf that he fhould contribute fomething towards the establishment of the king's government, and to the union of his fubjects. He added, that if the court thought him fincere in those professions, a treaty with him was unneceffary; and if they did not believe fo, then a treaty would be dangerous to him. The Earl of STAIR, who has also confirmed this account of Lord Bo-LINGBROKE's, in a letter to Mr. CRAGGS, readily came into his fentiments on this head, and foon after the king approved it upon their reprefentations ; he accordingly received a promise of pardon from GEORGE I. who on the 2d of July 1716, created his father baron of BATTERSEA, in the county of Surry, and vifcount ST. JOHN. This feemed preparatory to his own reftoration; and inftead of profecuting any farther ambitious fchemes against the government, he rather began to turn his mind to philosophy; and fince he could not gratify gratify his ambition to its full extent, he endeavoured to learn the arts of despising it. The variety of distressful events that had hitherto attended all his struggles, at last had thrown him into a state of reflection, and this produced, by way of relief, a confolatio philosophica, which he wrote the same year, under the title of Reflections upon Exile. In this piece, in which he professes to imitate the manner of SENECA, he, with fome wit, draws his own picture, and reprefents himfelf as fuffering perfecution, for having ferved his country with abilities and integrity. A flate of exile thus incurred, he very justly shews to be rather ho-nourable than distressful; and indeed, there are few men that will deny, but that the company of strangers to virtue, is better than the company of enemies to it. Befides this philosophical tract, he also wrote this year feveral letters, in answer to the charge laid upon him by the Pretender and his adherents; and the following year he drew up a vindication of his whole conduct with refpect to the tories, in the form of a letter to Sir WILLIAM WYNDHAM.

Nor was he fo entirely devoted to the fatigues of bufinefs, but that he gave pleafure a share in his purfuits. He had never much agreed with the lady he first married, and after a fhort cohabitation, they feparated, and lived ever after afunder. She therefore remained in England, upon his going into exile, and by proper application to the throne, was allowed a fufficient maintenance to fupport her with becoming dignity : however, she did not long survive his first difgrace; and upon his becoming a widower, he began to think of trying his fortune once more, in a flate which was at first so unfavourable. For this purpose, he cast his eye on the widow of the marquis of VILLETTE, and niece to the famous madam MAINTENON; a young lady of great merit rit and underftanding, poffeffed of a very large fortune, but incumbered with a long and troublefome law-fuit. In the company of this very fenfible woman, he paffed his time in France, fometimes in the country, and fometimes at the capital, till the year 1723, in which, after the breaking up of the parliament, his majefty was pleafed to grant him a pardon as to his perfonal fafety, but as yet neither reftoring him to his family inheritance, his title, or a feat in parliament.

To obtain this favour, had been the governing principle of his politics for fome years before; and upon the firft notice of his good fortune, he prepared to return to his native country, where, however, his deareft connections were either dead, or declared themfelves fufpicious of his former conduct in fupport of their party. It is obfervable, that bifhop ATTERBURY, who was banifhed at this time, for a fuppofed treafonable correfpondence in favour of the tories, was fet on fhore at Calais, juft when Lord BOLINGBROKE arrived there on his return to England. So extraordinary a reverfe of fortune, could not fail of ftrongly affecting that good prelate, who obferved with fome emotion, that he perceived himfelf to be exchanged : he prefently left it to his auditors to imagine, whether his country were the lofer or the gainer by fuch an exchange.

LORD BOLINGBROKE, upon his return to his fiative country, began to make very vigorous applications for further favours from the crown; his pardon, without the means of fupport, was but an empty, or perhaps it might be called a diftrefsful act of kindnefs, as it brought him back among his former friends, in a flate of inferiority his pride could not endure. However, his applications were foon after 2

fuccessful, for in about two years after his return, he obtained an act of parliament to reftore him to his family inheri-tance, which amounted to near three thousand pounds a year. He was also enabled by the fame to posiefs any purchafe he fhould make of any other eftate in the kingdom; and he accordingly pitched upon a feat of Lord TANKER-VILLE's, at Dawley, near Uxbridge in Middlefex, where he fettled with his lady, and laid himfelf out to enjoy the rural pleafures in perfection, fince the more glorious ones of ambition were denied him. With this refolution he began to improve his new purchafe in a very peculiar ftyle, giving it all the air of a country farm, and adorning even his hall with all the implements of husbandry. We have a sketch of his way of living in this retreat, in a letter of POPE's to SWIFT, who omits no opportunity of reprefenting his lord-fhip in the most amiable points of view. This letter is dated from Dawley, the country farm above mentioned, and begins thus. " I now hold the pen for my Lord BOLING-" BROKE, who is reading your letter between two hay-cocks; " but his attention is fomewhat diverted, by caffing his " eyes on the clouds, not in admiration of what you fay, " but for fear of a fhower. He is pleafed with your placing " him in the triumvirate, between yourfelf and me; though ". he fays he doubts he shall fare like LEPIDUS, while one of " us runs away with all the power, like Augustus, and " another with all the pleafure, like ANTONY. It is upon " a forefight of this, that he has fitted up his farm,, " and you will agree that this fcheme of retreat is not "founded upon weak appearances. Upon his return from Bath, he finds all peccant humours are purged out of him; and his great temperance and æconomy are fo fig-nal, that the first is fit for my constitution, and the latter " would enable you to lay up fo much money as to buy a " bishopric

<sup>6</sup> bifhopric in England. As to the return of his health <sup>6</sup> and vigour, were you here, you might enquire of his hay-" makers; but as to his temperance, I can answer that for " one whole day, we have had nothing for dinner but mut-' ton-broth, beans and bacon, and a barn-door fowl. Now " his lordship is run after his cart, I have a moment left to " myfelf to tell you, that I overheard him yesterday agree " with a painter for two hundred pounds, to paint his " country-hall with rakes, spades, prongs, &c. and other " ornaments, merely to countenance his calling this place " a FARM." What POPE here fays of his engagements with a painter, was fhortly after executed; the hall was painted accordingly in black crayons only, fo that at first view it brought to mind the figures often feen fcratched with charcoal, or the fmoak of a candle, upon the kitchen walls of farm-houfes. The whole however produced a most striking effect, and over the door at the entrance into it, was this motto: SATIS BEATUS RURIS HONORIBUS. His lordship feemed to be extremely happy in this purfuit of moral tranquility: and in the exultation of his heart could not fail of communicating his fatisfactions to his friend SwIFT. "I am in my own farm, fays he, and here I fhoot ftrong and tenacious roots : I have caught hold of the earth, to use a gardener's phrase, and neither my enemies nor my friends will find it an eafy matter to transplant me again."

THERE is not, perhaps, a ftronger inftance in the world than his lordship, that an ambitious mind can never be fairly fubdued, but will still feek for those gratifications which retirement can never fupply. All this time he was miftaken in his passion for folitude, and supposed that to be the child of philosophy, which was only the effects of spleen : it was in vain that he attempted to take root in the shade of obscurity;

rity; he was originally bred in the glare of public occupation, and he fecretly once more wifhed for transplantation. He was only a titular lord, he had not been thoroughly reftored; and, as he was excluded from a feat in the house of peers, he burned with impatience to play a part in that confpicuous theatre. Impelled by this defire, he could no longer be reftrained in obscurity, but once more entered into the buftle of public bufinefs, and difavowing all obligations to the minister, he embarked in the opposition against him, in which he had feveral powerful coadjutors : but previously he had taken care to prefer a petition to the house of commons, defiring to be reinstated in his former emoluments and capacities. This petition at first occasioned very warm debates; WALPOLE, who pretended to espouse his cause, al-ledged that it was very right to admit him to his inheritance; and when Lord WILLIAM PAWLET moved for a claufe, to difqualify him from fitting in either houfe, WAL-POLE rejected the motion, fecretly fatisfied with a refolution which had been fettled in the cabinet, that he fhould never more be admitted into any share of power. To this artful method of evading his pretenfions, BOLINGBROKE was no ftranger; and he was now refolved to shake that power, which thus endeavoured to obstruct the increase of his own: taking therefore his part in the opposition with PULTNEY, while the latter engaged to manage the houfe of commons, BOLINGBROKE undertook to enlighten the people : accordingly he foon diftinguished himself by a multitude of pieces, written during the latter part of GEORGE the first's reign, and likewife the beginning of that which fucceeded. Thefe were conceived with great vigour and boldnefs; and now, once more engaged in the fervice of his country, though difarmed, gagged, and almost bound, as he declared himself to be, yet he refolved not to abandon his caufe, as long as he could depend on the firmnefs and integrity of thofe coadjutors, who did not labour under the fame difadvantages with himfelf. His letters in a paper called the Craftfman, were particularly diffinguifhed in this political conteft; and though feveral of the moft expert politicians of the times joined in this paper, his effays were peculiarly relifhed by the public. However, it is the fate of things written to an occafion, feldom to furvive that occafion: the Craftfman, though written with great fpirit and fharpnefs, is now almoft forgotten, although when it was publifhed as a weekly paper, it fold much more rapidly than even the Spectator. Befide this work, he publifhed feveral other feparate pamphlets, which were afterwards reprinted in the fecond edition of his works, and which were very popular in their day.

THIS political warfare continued for ten years, during which time he laboured with great ftrength and perfeverance, and drew up fuch a fyftem of politics, as fome have fuppofed to be the moft complete now exifting. But, as upon all other occafions, he had the mortification once more to fee those friends defert him, upon whose affiftance he most firmly relied, and all that web of fine-fpun speculation actually deftroyed at once by the ignorance of some and the perfidy of others. He then declared that he was perfectly cured of his patriotic phrenzy; he fell out not only with PULTNEY for his felfish views, but with his old friends the tories, for abandoning their cause as desperate, averring, that the faint and unsteady exercise of parts on one fide, was a crime but one degree inferior to the iniquitous misplication of them on the other. But he could not take leave of a controversy in which he had been fo many years engaged, without giving a parting blow, in which he feemed to fummon up all his vigour at once, and where, as the poet fays,

Animam in vulnere pofuit.

This inimitable piece is intitled, A Differtation on Parties, and of all his mafterly pieces, it is in general effected the best.

HAVING finished this, which was received with the utmost avidity, he refolved to take leave not only of his enemies and friends, but even of his country; and in this refolution, in the year 1736, he once more retired to France, where he looked to his native country with a mixture of anger and pity, and upon his former professing friends, with a share of contempt and indignation. I expect little, fays he, from the principal actors that tread the stage at prefent. They are divided not fo much as it feemed, and as they would have it believed, about measures. The true division is about their different ends. Whilft the minister was not hard pushed, nor the profpect of fucceeding to him near, they appeared to have but one end, the reformation of the government. The deftruction of the minister was purfued only as a preliminary, but of effential and indifputable neceffity, to that end : but when his deftruction feemed to approach, the object of his fuccession interposed to the fight of many, and the reformation of the government was no longer their point of view. They had divided the skin, at least in their thoughts, before they had taken the beaft. The common fear of haftening his downfal for others, made them all faint in the chace. It was this, and this alone, that faved him, and put off his evil day.

SUCH were his cooler reflections, after he had laid down his political pen, to employ it in a manner that was much more agreeable to his ufual profeftions, and his approaching age. He had long employed the few hours he could fpare, on fubjects of a more general and important nature to the interefts of mankind; but as he was frequently interrupted by the alarms of party, he made no great proficiency in his defign. Still, however, he kept it in view, and he makes frequent mention in his letters to SWIFT, of his intentions to give metaphyfics a new and ufeful turn. I know, fays he, in one of thefe, how little regard you pay to writings of this kind; but I imagine, that if you can like any, it muft be thofe that ftrip metaphyfics of all their bombaft, keep within the fight of every well conflituted eye, and never bewilder themfelves, whilft they pretend to guide the reafon of others.

HAVING now arrived at the fixtieth year of his age, and being bleffed with a very competent fhare of fortune, he retired into France, far from the noife and hurry of party; for his feat at Dawley was too near to devote the reft of his lifeto retirement and fludy. Upon his going to that country, as it was generally known that difdain, vexation, and difappointment had driven him there, many of his friends, as well as his enemies, fuppofed that he was once again gone over to the Pretender. Among the number who entertained this fufpicion, was SwIFT, whom POPE, in one of his letters, very roundly chides for harbouring fuch an unjuft opinion. "You " fhould be cautious, fays he, of cenfuring any motion or " action of lord BOLINGBROKE, becaufe you hear it only from a " shallow, envious, and malicious reporter. What you " writ to me about him, I find, to my great fcandal, repeat-" ed in one of yours to another. Whatever you might hint " to me, was this for the profane ? The thing, if true, fhould " be concealed; but it is, I affure you, abfolutely untrue " in

" in every circumstance. He has fixed in a very agreeable " retirement, near Fontainbleau, and makes it his whole " bufinefs vACARE LITTERIS."

THIS REPROOF FROM POPE was not more friendly than it was true; lord BOLINGEROKE was too well acquainted with the forlorn flate of that party, and the folly of its conductors, once more to embark in their defperate concerns. He now faw that he had gone as far towards reinflating himfelf in the full pofferfion of his former honours, as the mere dint of parts and application could go, and was at length experimentally convinced, that the decree was abfolutely irreverfible, and the door of the houfe of lords finally flut againft him. He therefore, at POPE's fuggeftion, retired merely to be at leifure from the broils of oppofition, for the calmer pleafures of philofophy. Thus the decline of his life, though lefs brilliant, became more amiable, and even his happinefs was improved by age, which had rendered his paffions more moderate, and his wifhes more attainable.

But he was far from fuffering, even in folitude, his hours to glide away in torpid inactivity. That active reftlefs difpolition, flill continued to actuate his purfuits; and having loft the feafon for gaining power over his cotemporaries, he was now refolved upon acquiring fame from pofterity. He had not been long in his retreat near Fontainbleau, when he began a courfe of letters on the fludy and ufe of hiftory, for the ufe of a young nobleman. In these he does not follow the methods of St. REAL and others who have treated on this fubject, who make hiftory the great fountain of all knowledge; he very wifely confines its benefits, and fuppofes them to confift in deducing general maxims from particular facts, than in illuftrating maxims by the application of hiftorical f 2 paffages.

paffages. In mentioning ecclefiaftical hiftory, he gives his opinion very freely, upon the fubject of the divine original of the facred books, which he fuppofes to have no fuch foundation. This new fyftem of thinking, which he had always propagated in converfation, and which he now began to adopt in his more laboured compositions, feemed no way fupported either by his acutenefs or his learning. He began to reflect ferioufly on thefe fubjects too late in life, and to fuppofe those objections very new and unanfwerable, which had been already confuted by thoufands. "Lord BOLING-"BROKE, fays POPE, in one of his letters, is above trifling; "when he writes of any thing in this world, he is more "than mortal. If ever he trifles, it must be when he turns "divine."

In the mean time, as it was evident, that a man of his active ambition, in chufing retirement when no longer able to lead in public, must be liable to ridicule in refuming a refigned philosophical air : in order to obviate the cenfure, he addressed a letter to lord BATHURST, upon the true use of retirement and fludy; in which he flows himfelf ftill able and willing to undertake the caufe of his country, whenever its diffress should require his exertion. " I have, fays he, renounced neither my country, nor my friends; and by friends I mean all those, and those alone, who are fuch to their country. In their profperity, they shall never hear of me; in their diffress, always. In that retreat wherein the remainder of my days shall be spent, I may be of some use to them, fince even from thence I may advise, exhort, and warn them." Bent upon this purfuit only, and having now exchanged the gay flatefman for the grave philosopher, he shone forth with distinguished lustre. His conversation took a different turn from what had been usual with him; and, as we are affured by lord ORRERY, who knew him, it united the wildom of Socrates, the dignity and eafe of PLINY, and the wit of HORACE.

YET still amidst his resolutions to turn himself from politics, and to give himfelf up entirely to the calls of philofophy, he could not refift embarking once more in the debates of his country; and coming back from France, fettled at Battersea, an old feat which was his father's, and had been long in the pofieffion of the family. He supposed he faw an impending calamity; and though it was not in his power to remove, he thought it his duty to retard its fall. To redeem or fave the nation from perdition, he thought impoffible, fince national corruptions were to be purged by national calamities; but he was refolved to lend his feeble affiftance, to ftem the torrent that was pouring in. With this fpirit he wrote that excellent piece, which is intituled, The Idea of a Patriot King; in which he defcribes a monarch uninfluenced by party, leaning to the fuggestions neither of whigs nor tories, but equally the friend and the father of all. Some time after, in the year 1749, after the conclusion of the peace, two years before the measures taken by the adminiftration, feemed not to have been repugnant to his notions of political prudence for that juncture; in that year he wrote his last production, containing reflections on the then state of the nation, principally with regard to her taxes and debts, and on the caufes and confequences of them. This undertaking was left unfinished, for death fnatched the pen from the hand of the writer.

HAVING paffed the latter part of his life in dignity and fplendor, his rational faculties improved by reflection, and his ambition kept under by difappointment, his whole aim feemed to have been to leave the ftage of life, on which he had had acted fuch various parts, with applaufe. He had long wifhed to fetch his laft breath at Batterfea, the place where he was born; and fortune, that had through life feemed to traverfe all his aims, at laft indulged him in this. He had long been troubled with a cancer in his cheek, by which excruciating difeafe, he died on the verge of fourfcore years of age. He was confonant with himfelf to the laft, and thofe principles which he had all along avowed, he confirmed with his dying breath, having given orders that none of the clergy fhould be permitted to trouble him in his lateft moments.

His body was interred in Batterfea church, with those of his ancestors; and a marble monument erected to his memory, with the following excellent inscription.

Here lies

HENRY ST. JOHN, In the Reign of Queen Anne Secretary of War, Secretary of State, and Vifcount Bolingbroke. In the Days of King George I. and King George II. Something more and better. His attachment to Queen Anne, Exposed him to a long and fevere Perfecution; He bore it with Firmness of Mind. He paffed the latter Part of his Time at home, -The Enemy of no national Party; The Friend of no Faction. Diftinguished under the Cloud of Profcription, Which had not been entirely taken off, By Zeal to maintain the Liberty, And to reftore the ancient Prosperity Of Great Britain. He died the 12th of December 1751, Aged 79.

In this manner lived and died lord BOLINGEROKE ; ever active, never depreffed, ever purfuing fortune, and as conflantly difappointed by her. In whatever light we view his character, we fhall find him an object rather properer for our wonder, than our imitation ; more to be feared than efteemed, and gaining our admiration without our love. His ambition ever aimed at the fummit of power, and nothing feemed capable of fatisfying his immoderate defires, but the liberty of governing all things without a rival. With as much ambition, as great abilities, and more acquired knowledge than CÆSAR, he wanted only his courage to be as fuccefsful : but the fchemes his head dictated, his heart often refufed to execute ; and he loft the ability to perform, juft when the great occafion called for all his efforts to engage.

The fame ambition that prompted him to be a politician, actuated him as a philosopher. His aims were equally great and extensive in both capacities : unwilling to fubmit to any in the one, or any authority in the other, he entered the fields of science, with a thorough contempt of all that had been eftablished before him, and seemed willing to think every thing wrong, that he might fhew his faculty in the reformation. It might have been better for his quiet, as a man, if he had been content to act a subordinate character in the state; and it had certainly been better for his memory as a writer, if he had aimed at doing less than he attempted. Wifdom, in morals, like every other art or fcience, is an accumulation that numbers have contributed to increase; and it is not for one fingle man to pretend, that he can add more to the heap, than the thousands that have gone before him. Such innovations more frequently retard, than promote knowledge; their maxims are more agreeable to the reader, by having the gloss of novelty to recommend them, than those which which are trite, only becaufe they are true. Such men are therefore followed at first with avidity, nor is it till fome time that their disciples begin to find their error. They often, though too late, perceive, that they have been following a fpeculative enquiry, while they have been leaving a practical good; and while they have been practifing the arts of doubting, they have been losing all firmness of principle which might tend to establish the rectitude of their private conduct. As a moralift, therefore, lord BOLINGBROKE, by having endeavoured at too much, feems to have done nothing: but as a political writer, few can equal, and none can exceed him. As he was a practical politician, his writings are lefs filled with those speculative illusions, which are the refult of folitude and feclusion. He wrote them with a certainty of their being opposed, fifted, examined, and reviled; he therefore took care to build them up of fuch materials, as could not be eafily overthrown : they prevailed at the times in which they were written, they still continue to the admiration of the prefent age, and will probably laft for ever.

TO

Was well enough acquainted with the general character of mankind, and in particular with that of my own countrymen, to expect to be as much out of the minds of the tories during my exile, as if we had never lived and acted together. I depended on being forgot by them, and was far from imagining it poffible that I fhould be remembered, only to be condemned loudly by one half of them, and to be tacitly cenfured by the greatest part of the other half. As foon as I was feparated from the pretender and his interest, I declared myself to be fo, and I gave directions for writing into England what I judged fufficient to put my friends on their guard against any furprise concerning an event which it was their interest, as well as mine, that they should be very rightly informed about.

As foon as the pretender's adherents began to clamor againft me in this country, and to difperfe their fcandal by circular letters every where elfe, I gave directions for writing into England again. Their groundlefs articles of accufation were refuted, and enough was faid to give my friends a general idea of what had happened to me, and at leaft to make  $A_2$  them

them fulpend the fixing any opinion till fuch time as I fhould be able to write more fully and plainly to them myfelf. To condemn no perfon unheard is a rule of natural equity, which we fee rarely violated in/Turky, or in the country where I am writing: that it would not be fo with me in Great Britain, I confefs that I flattered myfelf. I dwelt fecurely in this confidence, and gave very little attention to any of those fcurrilous methods which were taken, about this time, to blast my reputation. The event of things has shewn, that I trusted too much to my own innocence, and to the justice of my old friends.

IT was obvious, that the chevalier and the earl of MAR hoped to load me with the imputation of treachery, incapacity, or neglect; it was indifferent to them of which. If they could afcribe to one of those their not being supported from France, they imagined that they should justify their precipitate flight from Scotland, which many of their fastest friends exclaimed against; and that they should varnish over that original capital fault, the drawing the highlanders together in arms at the time and in the manner in which it was done.

THE Scotch, who fell at once from all the fanguine expectations with which they had been foothed, and who found themfelves reduced to defpair, were eafy to be incenfed : they had received no fupport whatever, and it was natural for them rather to believe, that they failed of this fupport by my fault, than to imagine their general had prevailed on them to rife in the very point of time when it was impoffible that they fhould be fupported from France, or from any other part of the world. The duke of ORMOND, who had been the bubble of his own popularity, was enough out of humour with the general turn of affairs to be eafily fet againft any particular ticular man. The emiffaries of this court, whofe commiffion was to amufe, had impofed upon him all along, and there were other bufy people who thought to find their account in having him to themfelves. I had never been in his fecret whilft we were in England together : and from his first coming into France he was either prevailed upon by others, or, which I rather believe, he concurred with others to keep me out of it. The perfect indifference I shewed whether I was in it or no, might carry him from acting sparately, to act against me.

THE whole tribe of irifh and other papifts were ready to feife the first opportunity of venting their spleen against a man, who had constantly avoided all intimacy with them; who acted in the same cause but on a different principle, and who meant no one thing in the world less than raising them to the advantages which they expected.

THAT these feveral perfons, for the reasons I have mentioned, should join in a cry against me, is not very marvellous : the contrary would be fo to a man who knows them as well as I do. But that the english tories should ferve as echos to them, nay more, that my character should continue doubtful at best amongst you, when those who first propagated the flander are become assumed of railing without proof, and have dropped the clamor, this I own that I never expected, and I may be allowed to fay, that as it is an extreme furprife, fo it shall be a lesson to me.

THE whigs impeached and attainted me. They went farther—at leaft in my way of thinking that flep was more cruel than all the others—by a partial reprefentation of facts, and pieces of facts, put together as it beft fuited their purpofe, and published to the whole world, they did all that in them lay lay to expole me for a fool, and to brand me for a knave. But then I had deferved this abundantly at their hands, according to the notions of party-juftice. The tories have not indeed impeached nor attainted me; but they have done, and are ftill doing fomething very like to that which I took worfe of the whigs, than the impeachment and attainder: and this, after I have fhewn an inviolable attachment to the fervice, and almost an implicit obedience to the will of the party; when I am actually an out-law, deprived of my honors, ftripped of my fortune, and cut off from my family and my country for their fakes.

Some of the perfons who have feen me here, and with whom I have had the pleafure to talk of you, may, perhaps, have told you, that far from being opprefied by that florm of misfortunes in which I have been toffed of late, I bear up againft it with firmnefs enough, and even with alacrity. It is true, I do fo: but it is true likewife, that the laft burft of the cloud has gone near to overwhelm me. From our enemies we expect evil treatment of every fort, we are prepared for it, we are animated by it, and we fometimes triumph in it: but when our friends abandon us, when they wound us, and when they take, to do this, an occasion where we fland the moft in need of their fupport, and have the beft title to it, the firmeft mind finds it hard to refift.

NOTHING kept up my fpirits when I was first reduced to the very circumstances I now defcribe, fo much as the confideration of the delusions under which I knew that the tories lay, and the hopes I entertained of being able foon to open their eyes, and to justify my conduct. I expected that friendfhip, or if that principle failed, curiofity at least would move the party to fend over fome perfon, from whose report they might have both fides of the question laid before them. 3 Tho

Tho this expectation be founded in reason, and you want to be informed at least as much as I do to be juftified, yet L have hitherto flattered myfelf with it in vain. To repair this misfortune, therefore, as far as lies in my power, I refolve, to put into writing the fum of what I should have faid in that cafe :: thefe papers shall lie by me till time and accidents produce fome occasion of communicating them to you. The true occasion of doing it, with advantage to the party, will probably be loft : but they will remain a monument of my justification to posterity. At worst if even this fails me, I am fure of one satisfaction in writing them ; the fatisfaction of unburdening my mind to a friend, and of stating before an equitable judge the account, as I apprehend it to stand, between the tories and myself. " Quantam humano concilio efficere potui, circumspectis " rebus meis omnibus, rationibusque fubductis, fummam " feci cogitationum mearum omnium, quam tibi fi po-" tero breviter exponam."

It is neceffary to my defign that I call to your mind the flate of affairs in Britain from the latter part of the year one thoufand feven hundred and ten, to the beginning of the year one thoufand feven hundred and fifteen, about which time we parted. I go no farther back, becaufe the part which I acted before that time, in the first effays I made in public affairs, was the part of a tory, and fo far of a piece with that which I acted afterwards. Befides, the things which preceded this fpace of time had no immediate influence on thofe which happened fince that time; whereas the ftrange events which we have feen fall out in the king's reign were owing in a great meafure to what was done, or neglected to be done, in the laft four years of the queen's. The memory of thefe events being fresh, I shall dwell as little as possible upon them. It will be fufficient that I make make a rough sketch of the face of the court, and of the conduct of the several parties during that time. Your memory will soon furnish the colors which I shall omit to lay, and finish up the picture.

 $F_{ROM}$  the time at which I left Britain I had not the advantage of acting under the eyes of the party which I ferved, nor of being able from time to time to appeal to their judgment. The grofs of what happened has appeared, but the particular fleps which led to those events have been either concealed or misrepresented. Concealed from the nature of them, or misrepresented by those with whom I never agreed perfectly, except in thinking that they and I were extremely unfit to continue embarked in the fame bottom together. It will, therefore, be proper to descend, under this head, to a more particular relation.

IN the fummer of the year one thousand feven hundred and ten the queen was prevailed upon to change her parliament and her ministry. The intrigue of the earl of OXFORD might facilitate the means, the violent profecution of SA-CHEVEREL, and other unpopular measures 'might create the occasion, and encourage her in the resolution : but the true original cause was the personal ill usage which she received in her private life, and in some trifling instances of the exercise of her power; for indulgence in which she would certainly have left the reins of government in those hands, which had held them ever fince her accession to the throne.

I AM afraid that we came to court in the fame difpolitions as all parties have done; that the principal fpring of our actions was to have the government of the flate in our hands; that our principal views were the confervation of this this power, great employments to ourfelves, and great opportunities of rewarding those who had helped to raise us, and of hurting those who stood in opposition to us. It is however true, that with these confiderations of private and party interest, there were others intermingled which had for their object the public good of the nation, at least what we took to be fuch.

WE looked on the political principles which had generally prevailed in our government from the revolution in one thoufand fix hundred and eighty eight to be deftructive of our true interest, to have mingled us too much in the affairs of the continent, to tend to the impoverishing our people, and to the loofening the bands of our conflitution in church and flate. We fuppoled the tory party to be the bulk of the landed intereft, and to have no contrary influence blended into its compolition. We supposed the whigs to be the remains of a party, formed against the ill defigns of the court under king CHARLES the fecond, nurfed up into ftrength and applied to contrary uses by king WILLIAM the third, and yet still fo weak as to lean for fupport on the prefbyterians and the other fectaries, on the bank and the other corporations, on the Dutch and the other allies. From hence we judged it to follow, that they had been forced, and must continue fo, to render the national interest subservient to the interest of those who lent them an additional ftrength, without which they could never be the prevalent party. The view, therefore, of those amongst us who thought in this manner, was to improve the queen's favor, to break the body of the whigs, to render their fupports ufelefs to them, and to fill the employments of the kingdom down to the meaneft with tories. We imagined that fuch measures, joined to the advantages of our numbers and our property, would fecure us against all attempts during her reign; and that we fhould foon become too confiderable, not to make our terms in all events which might happen afterwards: concerning which, to fpeak truly, I believe few or none of us had any very fettled refolution.

In order to bring these purposes about, I verily think that the perfecution of diffenters entered into no man's head. By the bills for preventing occafional conformity and the growth of schifm, it was hoped that their sting would be taken away. Thefe bills were thought neceffary for our party interest, and besides were deemed neither unreasonable nor unjust. The good of fociety may require that no perfon fhould be deprived of the protection of the government on account of his opinions in religious matters, but it does not follow from hence that men ought to be trufted in any degree with the prefervation of the eftablishment, who must, to be consistent with their principles, endeavor the fubverfion of what is eftablished. An indulgence to confciences, which the prejudice of education and long habits have rendered forupulous, may be agreeable to the rules of good policy and of humanity : yet will it hardly follow from hence, that a government is under any obligation to indulge a tenderness of confcience to come; or to connive at the propagating of these prejudices, and at the forming of these habits. The evil effect is without remedy, and may therefore deferve indulgence; but the evil caufe is to be prevented, and can, therefore, be intitled to none. Befides this, the bills I am fpeaking of, rather than to enact any thing new, feemed only to enforce the observation of antient laws; which had been judged neceffary for the fecurity of the church and state, at a time when the memory of the ruin of both, and of the hands by which that ruin had been wrought, was fresh in the minds of men.

THE bank, the east-India company, and in general the moneyed intercs, had certainly nothing to apprchend like what

what they feared, or affected to fear from the tories, an entire fubverfion of their property. Multitudes of our own party would have been wounded by fuch a blow. The intention of those, who were the warmest, seemed to me to go no farther than reftraining their influence on the legiflature, and on matters of flate; and finding at a proper feafon means to make them contribute to the fupport and eafe of a government, under which they enjoyed advantages fo much greater than the reft of their fellow fubjects. The mifchievous confequence which had been forefeen and foretold too, at the eftablishment of those corporations, appeared visibly. The country gentlemen were vexed, put to great expences and even baffled by them in their elections : and among the members of every parliament numbers were immediately or indirectly under their influence. The bank had been extravagant enough to pull off the mask, and when the queen seemed to intend a change in her ministry, they had deputed fome of their members to reprefent against it. But that which touched fenfibly, even those who were but little affected by other confiderations, was the prodigious inequality between the condition of the moneyed men and of the reft of the nation. The proprietor of the land, and the merchant who brought riches home by the returns of foreign trade, had during two wars bore the whole immense load of the national expences; whilst the lender of money, who added nothing to the common ftock, throve by the public calamity, and contributed not a mite to the public charge.

As to the allies, I faw no difference of opinion among all those who came to the head of affairs at this time. Such of the tories as were in the fystem abovementioned, such of them as deferted foon after from us, and such of the whigs as had upon this occasion deferted to us, seemed equally convinced of the unreasonableness and even of the impossibility of continuing the war on the fame difproportionate foot. Their univerfal sense was that we had taken, except the part of the ftates general, the whole burden of the war upon us, and even a proportion of this; while the entire advantage was to accrue to others : that this had appeared very grofly in one thousand seven hundred and nine and one thousand seven hundred and ten, when preliminaries were infifted upon, which contained all that the allies, giving the greatest loofe to their wifnes, could defire, and little or nothing on the behalf of Great Britain : that the war, which had been begun for the fecurity of the allies, was continued for their grandeur; that the ends proposed when we engaged in it might have been answered long before, and therefore that the first favorable occasion ought to be feifed of making peace; which we thought to be the interest of our country, and which appeared to all mankind, as well as to us, to be that of our party.

THESE were in general the views of the torics, and for the part I acted in the profecution of them, as well as of all the meafures acceffory to them, I may appeal to mankind. To those who had the opportunity of looking behind the curtain I may likewife appeal for the difficulties which lay in my way, and for the particular difcouragements which I met with. A principal load of parliamentary and foreign affairs in their ordinary course, lay upon me : the whole negotiation of the peace and of the troublefome invidious steps preliminary to it, as far as they could be transacted at home, were thrown upon me. I continued in the house of commons during that important feffion which preceded the peace; and which, by the fpirit fhewn through the whole courfe of it, and by the refolutions taken in it, rendered the conclusion of the treaties practicable. After this I was dragged into the house of lords in fuch a manner, as to make my promotion a punifhment, not

IT would not have been hard to have forced the earl of OXFORD to use me better. His good intentions began to be very much doubted of : the truth is, no opinion of his fincerity had ever taken root in the party; and which was worfe, perhaps, for a man in his station, the opinion of his capacity began to fall apace. He was fo hard pushed in the house of lords in the beginning of one thousand feven hundred and twelve, that he had been forced, in the middle of the feffion, to perfuade the queen to make a promotion of twelve peers at once; which was an unprecedented and invidious measure, to be excufed by nothing but the neceffity, and hardly by that. In the house of commons his credit was low, and my reputation very high. You know the nature of that affembly: they grow, like hounds, fond of the man who fhews them game, and by whofe halloo they are used to be encouraged. The thread of the negotiations, which could not ftand still a moment without going back, was in my hands : and before another man could have made himfelf mafter of the bufinefs, much time would have been loft, and great inconveniencies would have followed. Some, who oppofed the court foon after, began to waver then : and if I had not wanted the inclination, I should have wanted no help to do mifchief. I knew the way of quitting my employments and of retiring from court when the fervice of my party required it : but I could not bring myfelf up to that refolution, when the confequence of it must have been the breaking my party, and the diftress of the public affairs. I thought my mistress treated me ill, but the fenfe of that duty which I owed her came in aid of other confiderations, and prevailed over my refentment. These fentiments, indeed, are so much out of fashion; that a man who avows them is in danger of paffing for a bubble 5 bubble in the world : yet they were, in the conjuncture I fpeak of, the true motives of my conduct, and you faw me go on as chearfully in the troublefome and dangerous work affigned me, as if I had been under the utmost fatisfaction. I began, indeed, in my heart, to renounce the friendship, which till that time I had preferved inviolable for Oxford. I was not aware of all his treachery, nor of the bafe and little means which he employed then, and continued to employ afterwards, to ruin me in the opinion of the queen and every where elfe. I faw, however, that he had no friendship for any body, and that with respect to me, instead of having the ability to render that merit which I endeavored to acquire an addition of ftrength to himfelf, it became the object of his jealoufy, and a reafon for undermining me. In this temper of mind I went on, till the great work of the peace was confummated, and the treaty figned at Utrecht : after which a new and more melancholy fcene for the party, as well as for me, opened itfelf.

I AM far from thinking the treaties, or the negotiations which led to them, exempt from faults. Many were made no doubt in both, by those who were concerned in them, by myfelf in the first place : and many were owing purely to the opposition they met with in every step of their progress. never look back on this great event, paffed as it is, without a fecret emotion of mind; when I compare the vaftnefs of the undertaking, and the importance of it's fuccefs, with the means employed to bring it about, and with those which were employed to traverse it. To adjust the pretensions and to fettle the interefts of fo many princes and states, as were engaged in the late war, would appear, when confidered fimply and without any adventitious difficulty, a work of prodigious extent. But this was not all. Each of our allies thought himfelf entituled to raife his demands to the most extravagant height. 5 height. They had been encouraged to this, first by the engagements which we had entered into with feveral of them; with fome to draw them into the war, with others to prevail on them to continue it, and fecondly by the manner in which we had treated with France in feventeen hundred nine and ten. Those who intended to tie the knot of the war as hard, and to render the coming at a peace as impracticable as they could, had found no method fo effectual as that of leaving every one at liberty to infift on all he could think of, and leaving themfelves at liberty, even if these concessions should be made, to break the treaty by ulterior demands. That this was the fecret, I can make no doubt after the confession of one of the * plenipotentiaries who transacted these matters, and who communicated to me and to two others of the queen's ministers an instance of the duke of MARLBOROUGH's management at a critical moment, when the french ministers at Gertrudenberg feemed inclinable to come into an expedient for explaining the thirty-feventh article of the preliminaries, which could not have been refused. Certain it is, that the king of France was at that time in earnest to execute the article of PHILIP's abdication : and therefore the expedients for adjusting what related to this article would eafily enough have been found, if on our part there had been a real intention of concluding. But there was no fuch intention : and the plan of those who meant to prolong the war was established among the allies, as the plan which ought to be followed whenever a peace came to be treated. The allies imagined, that they had a right to obtain at least every thing which had been demanded for them respectively: and it was visible that nothing lefs would content them. These confiderations fet the vaftnefs of the undertaking in a fufficient light.

THE importance of fucceeding, in the work of the peace, was equally great to Europe, to our country, to our party, to our perfons, to the prefent age, and to future generations. But I need not take pains to prove what no man will deny. The means employed to bring it about were in no degree proportionable. A few men, fome of whom had never been, concerned in bufinefs of this kind before, and most of whom put their hands for a long time to it faintly and timoroufly, were the inftruments of it. The minister who was at their head fhewed himfelf every day incapable of that attention, that method, that comprehension of different matters, which the first post in such a government as ours requires in quiet times. He was the first spring of all our motion by his credit with the queen, and his concurrence was necessary to every thing we did by his rank in the flate : and yet this man feemed to be fometimes afleer, and fometimes at play. He neglected the thread of bufinefs, which was carried on for this reafon with lefs difpatch and lefs advantage in the proper channels, and he kept none in his own hands. He negotiated, indeed, by fits and ftarts, by little tools, and in-, direct ways : and thus his activity became as hurtful as his indolence; of which I could produce fome remarkable inftances. No good effect could flow from fuch a conduct. In a word, when this great affair was once engaged, the zeal of particular men in their feveral provinces drove it forward, tho they were not backed by the concurrent force of the whole administration, nor had the common helps of advice till it was too late, till the very end of the negotiations : even in matters, fuch as that of commerce, which they could not be fupposed to understand. That this is a true account of the means used to arrive at the peace, and a true character of that administration in general, I believe the whole cabinet council of that time will bear me witnefs. Sure I am, that most of them have joined with me in lamenting this ftate of things whilft it fubfifted, and all those who were employed as ministers in the several parts of the treaty felt sufficiently ficiently the difficulties which this ftrange management often reduced them to. I am confident they have not forgot them.

- IF the means employed to bring the peace about were feeble, and in one respect contemptible, those employed to break the negotiation were ftrong and formidable. As foon as the first fuspicion of a treaty's being on foot crept abroad into the world, the whole alliance united with a powerful party in the nation to obstruct it. From that hour to the moment the congress of Utrecht finished, no one measure poffible to be taken was omitted to traverse every advance that was made in this work, to intimidate, to allure, to embarrafs every perfon concerned in it. This was done without any regard either to decency or good policy : and from hence it foon followed, that paffion and humor mingled themfelves on each fide. A great part of what we did for the peace, and of what others did against it, can be accounted for on no other principle. The allies were broke among themfelves before they began to treat with the common enemy. The matter did not mend in the course of the treaty : and France and Spain, but especially the former, profited of this difunion.

WHOEVER makes the comparison, which I have touched upon, will fee the true reafons which rendered the peace lefs anfwerable to the fuccefs of the war than it might, and than it ought to have been. Judgment has been paffed in this cafe, as the different paffions or interefts of men have infpired them. But the real caufe lay in the conftitution of our miniftry, and much more in the obftinate opposition which we met with from the whigs and from the allies. However, fure it is, that the defects of the peace did not occasion the defertions from the tory party which happened about this time, nor those diforders in the court which immediately followed.

LONG

Long before the purport of the treaties could be known, those whigs who had fet out with us, in seventeen hundred and ten, began to relapse back to their party. They had among us shared the harvest of a new ministry, and like prudent perfors they took measures in time to have their share in that of a new government.

THE whimfical, or the hanover-tories continued zealous in appearance with us, till the peace was figned. I faw no people fo eager for the conclusion of it *. Some of them were in fuch hafte, that they thought any peace preferable to the leaft delay, and omitted no inflances to quicken their friends who were actors in it. As foon as the treaties were perfected and laid before the parliament, the fcheme of these gentlemen began to disclose itself entirely. Their love of the peace, like other passions, cooled by enjoyment. They grew nice about the construction of the articles, could come up to no direct approbation, and, being let into the fecret of what was to happen, would not preclude themselves from the glorious advantage of rising on the ruins of their friends and of their party.

THE danger of the fucceffion, and the badnefs of the peace, were the two principles on which we were attacked. On the first, the whimfical tories joined the whigs, and declared directly against their party. Altho nothing is more certain than this truth, that there was at that time no formed defign in the party, whatever views fome particular men might have, against his majesty's accession to the throne. On the latter and most other points, they affected a most glorious neutrality.

INSTEAD of gathering ftrength, either as a ministry or as a party, we grew weaker every day. The peace had been judged with reafon to be the only folid foundation whereupon we could erect a tory fystem : and yet when it was made we found ourfelves at a full ftand. Nay the very work, which ought to have been the bafis of our ftrength, was in part demolished before our eyes, and we were stoned with the ruins of it. Whilft this was doing, Oxford looked on, as if he had not been a party to all which had paffed; broke now and then a jeft, which favored of the inns of court and the bad company in which he had been bred : and on those occafions, where his station obliged him to speak of business, was abfolutely unintelligible.

WHETHER this man ever had any determined view befides that of raifing his family is, I believe, a problematical queftion in the world. My opinion is, that he never had any other. The conduct of a minister, who proposes to himself a great and noble object, and who purfues it fleadily, mayfeem for a while a riddle to the world; efpecially in a government like ours, where numbers of men different in their characters and different in their interests are at all times to be managed : where public affairs are exposed to more accidents and greater hazards than in other countries; and where, by confequence, he who is at the head of bufinefs will find himfelf often diftracted by measures which have no relation to his purpofe, and obliged to bend himfelf to things which are in fome degree contrary to his main defign. The ocean which environs us is an emblem of our government : and the pilot and the minister are in fimilar circumstances. It feldom happens, that either of them can fleer a direct courfe, and they both arrive at their port by means which frequently feem to carry them from it. But as the work advances, advances, the conduct of him who leads it on with real abilities clears up, the appearing inconfiftencies are reconciled, and when it is once confummated, the whole shews itself fo uniform, fo plain, and fo natural, that every dabler in politics will be apt to think he could have done the fame. But on the other hand, a man who proposes no fuch object, who fubstitutes artifice in the place of ability, who instead of leading parties and governing accidents is eternally agitated backwards and forwards by both, who begins every day fomething new, and carries nothing on to perfection, may impose a while on the world : but a little sooner or a little later the myftery will be revealed, and nothing will be found to be couched under it but a thread of pitiful expedients, the ultimate end of which never extended farther than living from day to day. Which of these pictures resembles OxFORD most, you will determine. I am forry to be obliged to name him fo often; but how is it possible to do otherwife, while I am fpeaking of times wherein the whole turn of affairs depended on his motions and character?

I HAVE heard, and I believe truly, that when he returned to Windfor in the autumn of feventeen hundred and thirteen, after the marriage of his fon, he preffed extremely to have him created duke of NEWCASTLE or earl of CLARE : and the queen prefuming to hefitate on fo extraordinary a propofal, he refented this hefitation in a manner which little became a man who had been fo lately raifed by the profufion of her favors upon him. Certain it is, that he began then to fhew a ftill greater remiffinefs in all parts of his miniftry, and to affect to fay, that from fuch a time, the very time I am fpeaking of, he took no fhare in the direction of affairs, or words to that effect.

HE pretended to have difcovered intrigues which were fet on foot against him, and particularly he complained of the advan-

advantage which was taken of his absence, during the journey he made at his fon's marriage, to undermine him with the queen. He is naturally inclined to believe the worft, which I take to be a certain mark of a mean fpirit and a wicked foul: at least I am fure that the contrary quality, when it is not due to weakness of understanding, is the fruit of a generous temper, and an honeft heart. Prone to judge ill of all mankind, he will rarely be feduced by his credulity; but I never knew a man fo capable of being the bubble of his diftruft and jealoufy. He was fo in this cafe, altho the queen, who could not be ignorant of the truth, faid enough to undeceive him. But to be undeceived, and to own himfelf fo, was not his play. He hoped by cunning to varnish over his want of faith and of ability. He was defirous to make the world impute the extraordinary part, or to fpeak more properly, the no part which he acted with the staff of treasurer in his hand, to the queen's withdrawing her favor from him, and to his friends abandoning him : pretences utterly groundlefs, when he firft made them, and which he brought to be real at laft. Even the winter before the queen's death, when his credit began to wain apace, he might have regained it; he might have reconciled himfelf perfectly with all his antient friends, and have acquired the confidence of the whole party. I fay he might have done all this; because I am perfuaded that none of those I have named were fo convinced of his perfidy, fo jaded with his yoke, or fo much picqued perfonally against him as I was: and yet if he would have exerted himfelf in concert with us, to improve the few advantages which were left us, and to ward off the visible danger which threatened our perfons and our party, I would have flifled my private animofity, and would have acted under him with as much zeal as ever. But he was uncapable of taking fuch a turn. The fum of all his policy had been to amufe the whigs, the tories, and the jacobites, cobites, as long as he could, and to keep his power as long as he amufed them. When it became impossible to amufe mankind any longer, he appeared plainly at the end of his line.

By a fecret correspondence with the late earl of HALI-FAX, and by the intrigues of his brother, and other fanatical relations, he had endeavoured to keep fome hold on the whigs.

The tories were attached to him at first by the heat of a revolution in the ministry, by their hatred of the people who were difcarded, and by the fond hopes which it is eafy to give at the fetting out of a new administration. Afterwards he held out the peace in prospect to them, and to the jacobites, feparately, as an event which must be brought about before he could effectually ferve either. You cannot have forgot how things which we preffed were put off, upon every occasion, till the peace : the peace was to be the date of a new administration, and the period at which the millenary year of toryism should begin. Thus were the tories at that time amufed : and fince my exile I have had the opportunity of knowing certainly and circumftantially that the jacobites were treated in the fame manner, and that the pretender was made, through the french minister, to expect that measures should be taken for his restoration, as soon as the peace had rendered them practicable. He was to attempt nothing, his partifans were to lie still, OXFORD undertook for all.

AFTER many delays, fatal to the general intereft of Europe, this peace was figned, and the only confiderable thing which he brought about afterwards was the marriage I have mentioned above: and by it an acceffion of riches and honor to a family whofe eftate was very mean, and whofe illustration before this time I never met with any where but in the vain discourses which he used to hold over claret. If he kept his word with any of the parties abovementioned, it must be supposed that he did fo with the whigs; for as to us we faw nothing after the peace but increase of mortification and nearer approaches to ruin. Not a ftep was made towards completing the fettlement of Europe, which the treaties of Utrecht and Radstat left imperfect; towards fortifying and eftablishing, the tory party; towards fecuring those who had been the principal actors in this administra-tion against future events. We had proceeded in a confidence that these things should immediately follow the conclusion of the peace: he had never, I dare fwear, entertained a thought concerning them. As foon as the last hand was given to the fortune of his family, he abandoned his miftrefs, his friends, and his party, who had bore him fo many years on their shoulders : and I was present when this want of faith was reproached him in the plainest and strongest terms by one of the honefteft * men in Britain, and before fome of the most + confiderable tories. Even his impudence failed him on this occafion : he did not fo much as attempt an excufe.

HE could not keep his word which he had given the pretender and his adherents, becaufe he had formed no party to fupport him in fuch a defign. He was fure of having the whigs againft him if he made the attempt, and he was not fure of having the tories for him.

IN this ftate of confusion and diftrefs, to which he had reduced himfelf and us, you remember the part he acted. He was the fpy of the whigs, and voted with us in the morning against those very questions which he had penned the night before with WALPOLE and others .---- He kept his post on terms which no man but he would have held it on, neither fubmitting to the queen, nor complying with his friends. He would not, or he could not act with us, and he refolved that we should not act without him, as long as he could hinder it. The queen's health was very precarious, and at her death he hoped by these means to deliver us up, bound as it were hand and foot, to our adverfaries. On the foundation of this merit he flattered himfelf that he had gained fome of the whigs, and foftened at least the rest of the party to him. By his fecret negotiations at Hanover, he took it for granted that he was not only reconciled to that court, but that he should under his present majesty's reign have as much credit as he had enjoyed under that of the queen. He was weak enough to boaft of this, and to promife his good offices voluntarily to feveral, for no man was weak enough to think them worth being follicited. In a word, you muft have heard that he answered to lord DARTMOUTH and to Mr. BROMLEY, that one should keep the privy feal, and the other the feals of fecretary ; and that lord CowPER makes no feruple of telling how he came to offer him the feals of chancellor. When the king arrived, he went to Greenwich with an affectation of pomp and of favor. Against his fuspicious character, he was once in his life the bubble of his credulity: and this delusion betrayed him into a punishment, more fevere in my fense than all which has happened to him fince, or than perpetual exile; he was affronted in the manner in which he was prefented to the king. The meaneft fubject would have been received with goodnefs, the moft obnoxious with an air of indifference; but he was received with the most diftinguishing contempt. This treatment he had in the face of the nation. The king began his reign, in this inftance, with punishing the ingratitude, the perfidy,

the infolence which had been fhewn to his predeceffor. Ox-FORD fled from court covered with fhame, the object of the derifion of the whigs, and of the indignation of the tories.

THE queen might, if fhe had pleafed, have faved her felf from all those mortifications she met with during the last months of her reign, and her fervants and the tory party from those misfortunes which they endured during the fame time; perhaps from those which they have fallen into fince her death. When the found that the peace, from the conclusion of which she expected ease and quiet, brought still greater trouble upon her; when the faw the weakness of her government, and the confusion of her affairs encrease every day; when the faw her first minister bewildered and unable to extricate himfelf or her; in fine, when the negligence of his public conduct, and the fauciness of his private behavior had rendered him insupportable to her, and she took the refolution of laying him afide, there was a ftrength still remaining fufficient to have fupported her government, to have fulfilled in great part the expectations of the tories, and to have conftituted both them and the ministers in such a fituation as would have left them little to apprehend. Some defigns were indeed on foot which might have produced very great diforders : Oxford's conduct had given much occasion to them, and with the terror of them he endeavored to intimidate the queen. But expedients were not hard to be found, by which those defigns might have been nipped in the bud, or elfe by which the perfons who promoted them might have been induced to lay them afide. But that fatal irrefolution inherent to the Stuart-race hung upon her. She felt too much inward refentment to be able to conceal his difgrace from him : yet after he had made this discovery, she continued to trust all her power in his hands.

No people ever were in fuch a condition as ours continued to be from the autumn of one thousand seven hundred and thirteen, to the fummer following. The queen's health funk every day. The attack which fhe had in the winter at Windfor, ferved as a warning both to those who wished, and to those who feared her death, to expect it. The party which oppofed the court had been continually gaining ftrength by the weakness of our administration : and at this time their numbers were vaftly encreased, and their spirit was raised by the near profpect of the fucceffion taking place. We were not at liberty to exert the ftrength we had. We faw our danger, and many of us faw the true means of avoiding it : but whilft the magic wand was in the fame hands, this knowledge ferved only to encreafe our uneafinefs; and whether we would or no, we were forced with our eyes open to walk on towards the precipice. Every moment we became lefs able, if the queen lived, to support her government : if she died, to fecure our felves. One fide was united in a common view, and acted upon an uniform plan; the other had really none at all. We knew that we were out of favor at the court of Hanover, that we were represented there as jacobites, and that the elector, his prefent majesty, had been rendered publicly a party to that opposition, in spight of which we made the peace: and yet we neither had taken, nor could take in our prefent circumstances, any measures to be better or worfe there. Thus we languished till the twenty-feventh of July one thousand feven hundred and fourteen, when the queen difmiffed the treasurer. On the friday following, she fell into an apoplexy, and died on funday the first of August.

You do me, I dare fay, the justice to believe, that whilst this state of things lasted I faw very well, how little mentionfoever

foever I might make of it at the time, that no man in the ministry, or in the party, was fo much exposed as myself. I could expect no quarter from the whigs, for I had deferved none. There were perfons amongst them for whom I had great efteem and friendship; yet neither with these nor with any others had I preferved a fecret correspondence, which might be of use to me in the day of diffress: and befides the general character of my party, I knew that particular prejudices were entertained against me at Hanover. The whigs wanted nothing but an opportunity of attacking the peace, and it could hardly be imagined that they would ftop there. In which cafe, I knew that they could have hold on no man fo much as myfelf: the inftructions, the orders, the memorials had been drawn by me, the correspondence relating to it in France, and every where elfe, had been carried on by me; in a word, my hand appeared to almost every paper which had been writ in the whole courfe of the negotiation. To all these confiderations I added that of the weight of perfonal refentment, which I had created against my felf at home and abroad : in part unavoidably by the fhare I was obliged to take in these affairs; and in part, if you will, unneceffarily by the warmth of my temper, and by fome unguarded expressions for which I have no excuse to make, but that which TACITUS makes for his father-in-law, JULIUS AGRICOLA: " honeftius putabam offendere quam odifie."

HAVING this profpect of being diffinguished from the reft of my party, in the common calamity, by feverer treatment, I might have juftified myfelf, by reafon and by great authorities too, if I had made early provision, at least to be fafe, when I should be no longer useful. How I could have fecured this point I do not think fit to explain, but certain it is that I made no one ftep towards it. I refolved not to abandon my party by turning whig, or, which is worfe a great D 2 deal.

deal, whimfical, nor to treat feparately from it. I refolved to keep my felf at liberty to act on a tory bottom. If the queen difgraced OXFORD and continued to live afterwards, I knew we fhould have time and means to provide for our future fafety: if the queen died and left us in the fame unfortunate circumftances, I expected to fuffer for and with the tories, and I was prepared for it.

THE thunder had long grumbled in the air, and yet when the bolt fell, most of our party appeared as much surprised as if they had had no reason to expect it. There was a perfect calm and univerfal fubmiffion through the whole kingdom. The CHEVALIER indeed fet out as if his defign had been to gain the coaft and to embark for Great Britain, and the court of France made a merit to themfelves of ftopping him and obliging him to return. But this, to my certain knowledge, was a farce acted by concert, to keep up an opinion of his character, when all opinion of his caufe feemed to be at an end. He owned this concert to me at Bar, on the occafion of my telling him that he would have found no party ready to receive him, and that the enterprife would have been to the last degree extravagant. He was at this time far from having any encouragement : no party, numerous enough to make the least disturbance, was formed in his favor. On the king's arrival the ftorm arofe. The menaces. of the whigs, backed by fome very rafh declarations, by little circumstances of humor which frequently offend more than real injuries, and by the entire change of all the perfons in employment, blew up the coals.

At first many of the tories had been made to entertain fome faint hopes that they would be permitted to live in quiet. I have been affured that the king left Hanover in that resolution. Happy had it been for him and for us if he had had continued in it; if the moderation of his temper had not been overborne by the violence of party, and his and the national intereft facrificed to the paffions of a few. Others there were among the tories who had flattered themfelves with much greater expectations than thefe, and who had depended, not on fuch imaginary favor and dangerous advancement as was offered them afterwards, but on real credit and fubftantial power under the new government. Such impreffions on the minds of men had rendered the two houfes of parliament, which were then fitting, as good courtiers to king GEORGE, as ever they had been to queen ANNE. But all thefe hopes being at once and with violence extinguifhed, defpair fucceeded in their room.

OUR party began foon to act like men delivered over to their paffions, and unguided by any other principle; not like men fired by a juft refentment and a reafonable ambition to a bold undertaking. They treated the government like men who were refolved not to live under it, and yet they took no one meafure to fupport themfelves againft it. They expressed, without referve or circumspection, an eagerness to join in any attempt against the establishment which they had received and confirmed, and which many of them had courted but a few weeks before : and yet in the midst of all this bravery, when the election of the new parliament came on, fome of these very men acted with the coolness of those who are much better disposed to compound than to take arms.

THE body of the tories being in this temper, it is not to be wondered at, if they heated one another, and began apace to turn their eyes towards the pretender : and if those few, who had already engaged with him, applied themselves to improve the conjuncture and endeavored to lift a party for him.

I WENT,

ALETTERTO

I WENT, about a month after the queen's death, as foon as the feals were taken from me, into the country, and whilft I continued there, I felt the general difpofition to jacobitifm encrease daily among people of all ranks; among feveral who had been conftantly diftinguished by their averfion to that caufe. But at my return to London in the month of February or March one thousand seven hundred and fifteen, a few weeks before I left England, I began for the firft time in my whole life to perceive these general dispositions ripen into refolutions, and to obferve fome regular workings among many of our principal friends, which denoted a fcheme of this kind. These workings, indeed, were very faint, for the perfons concerned in carrying them on did not think it fafe to fpeak too plainly to men who were, in truth, ill difpofed to the government, becaufe they neither found their account at prefent under it, nor had been managed with art enough to leave them hopes of finding it hereafter; but who at the fame time had not the least affection for the pretender's perfon, nor any principle favorable to his intereft.

This was the ftate of things when the new parliament, which his majefty had called, affembled. A great majority of the elections had gone in favor of the whigs; to which the want of concert among the tories had contributed as much as the vigor of that party, and the influence of the new government. The whigs came to the opening of this parliament full of as much violence as could poffefs men who expected to make their court, to confirm themfelves in power, and to gratify their refentments by the fame meafures. I have heard that it was a difpute among the minifters how far this fpirit fhould be indulged, and that the king was determined, or confirmed in a determination, to confent to the profecutions, tions, and to give the reins to the party by the reprefentations that were made to him, that great difficulties would arife in the conduct of the feffion, if the court fhould appear inclined to check this fpirit, and by Mr. W———'s undertaking to carry all the bufinefs fuccefsfully through the houfe of commons if they were at liberty. Such has often been the unhappy fate of our princes : a real neceflity fometimes, and fometimes a feeming one, has forced them to compound with a part of the nation at the expence of the whole; and the fuccefs of their bufinefs for one year has been purchafed at the price of public diforder for many.

THE conjuncture I am fpeaking of affords a memorable inftance of this truth. If milder meafures had been purfued, certain it is, that the tories had never univerfally embraced jacobitifm. The violence of the whigs forced them into the arms of the pretender. The court and the party feemed to vie with one another which fhould go the greateft lengths in feverity : and the minifters, whofe true intereft it must at all times be to calm the minds of men, and who ought never to fet the examples of extraordinary inquiries or extraordinary accufations, were upon this occafion the tribunes of the people.

THE council of regency, which began to fit as foon as the queen died, acted like a council of the holy office. Whoever looked on the face of the nation faw every thing quiet; not one of those fymptoms appearing which must have thewn themselves more or less at that moment, if, in reality, there had been any measures taken during the former reign to defeat the protestant fuccession. His majesty ascended the throne with as little contradiction and as little trouble, as ever a fon fucceeded a father in the possession of a private patrimony. But he, who had the opportunity, which I had till my difmission, of feeing a great part of what passed in that council, would would have thought that there had been an opposition actually formed, that the new establishment was attacked openly from without, and betrayed from within.

THE fame difpolition continued after the king's arrival. This political inquifition went on with all the eagernefs imaginable in feifing of papers, in ranfacking the queen's clofet, and examining even her private letters. The whigs had clamored loudly, and affirmed in the face of the world, that the nation had been fold to France, to Spain, to the pretender : and whilft they endeavored in vain, by very fingular methods, to find fome color to juftify what they had advanced without proof, they put themfelves under an abfolute neceffity of grounding the most folemn profecution on things whereof they might indeed have proof, but which would never pass for crimes before any judges, but fuch as were parties at the fame time.

In the king's first speech from the throne, all the inflaming hints were given, and all the methods of violence were chalked out to the two houses. The first steps in both were perfectly answerable : and to the shame of the peerage be it fpoken, I faw at that time feveral lords concur to condemn, in one general vote, all that they had approved of in a former parliament by many particular refolutions. Among fe-veral bloody refolutions propofed and agitated at this time, the refolution of impeaching me of high treason was taken : and I took that of leaving England, not in a panic terror improved by the artifices of the duke of MARLBOROUGH, whom I knew even at that time too well to act by his advice or information in any cafe, but on fuch grounds as the proceedings which foon followed fufficiently juftified, and as I have never repented building upon. Those who blamed it in the first heat were foon after obliged to change their language; T

guage; for what other refolution could I take? The method of profecution defigned against me would have put me immediately out of condition to act for myfelf,' or to ferve those who were lefs exposed than me, but who were, however, in danger. On the other hand, how few were there on whofe affiftance I could depend, or to whom I would, even in those circumftances, be obliged? The ferment in the nation was wrought up to a confiderable height; but there was at that time no reason to expect that it would influence the proceedings in parliament in favor of those who should be accused. Left to it's own movement, it was much more proper to quicken than flacken the profecutions: and who was there to guide it's motions? The tories who had been true to one another to the laft were an handful, and no great vigor could be expected from them. The whimficals, difappointed of the figure which they hoped to make, began, indeed, to join their old friends. One * of the principal amongst them was fo very good as to confess to me, that if the court had called the fervants of the late queen to account, and had ftopped there, he must have confidered himself as a judge, and have acted according to his confcience on what fhould have appeared to him: but that way had been declared to the whole tory party, and that now the flate of things was altered. This difcourfe needed no commentary, and proved to me, that I had never erred in the judgment I made of this fet of men. Could I then refolve to be obliged to them, or to fuffer with OXFORD? As much as I still was heated by the difputes in which I had been all my life engaged against the whigs, I would fooner have chofe to owe my fecurity to their indulgence, than to the affiftance of the whimficals : but I thought banishment, with all her train of evils, preferable to either. I abhorred OxFORD to that degree, that I could not bear to be joined with him in any cafe. Nothing perhaps contributed fo much to determine me as this fentiment. A fenfe of honor would not have permitted me to diffinguish between his cafe and mine own : and it was worse than death to lie under the necessfity of making them the same, and of taking measures in concert with him.

I AM now come to the time at which I left England, and have finished the first part of that deduction of facts which I proposed to lay before you. I am hopeful, that you will not think it altogether tedious or unneceffary : for although very little of what I have faid can be new to you, yet this fummary account will enable you with greater ease to recal to your memory the passages of those four years, wherewith all that I am going to relate to you has an immediate and neceffary connexion.

In what has been faid I am far from making my own panegyric. I had not in those days fo much merit as was afcribed to me: nor fince that time have I had fo little as the fame perfons allowed me. I committed without difpute many faults, and a greater man than I can pretend to be, conftituted in the fame circumftances, would not have kept clear of all: but with respect to the tories I committed none. I carried the point of party-honor to the height, and facrificed every thing to my attachment to them during this period of time. Let us now examine whether I have done fo during the reft.

WHEN I arrived in France, about the end of March one thousand feven hundred and fifteen, the affairs of England were represented to me in another light than I had feen them in, when I looked upon them with my own eyes very few weeks before. I found the perfons, who were detached to 3 fpeak with me, prepared to think that I came over to negotiate for the pretender : and when they perceived that I was more ignorant than they imagined, I was affured by them, that there would be fuddenly an universal rifing in England and Scotland. The leaders were named to me, their engagements specified, and many gentlemen, yourself among others, were reckoned upon for particular fervices, tho I was certain you had never been treated with. From whence I concluded, and the event has justified my opinion, that these assurances had been given on the general characters of men, by fuch of our friends as had embarked fooner, and gone farther than the reft.

THIS management furprifed me extremely. In the anfwers I made, I endeavored to fet the miltake right: to fhew that things were far from the point of maturity imagined; that the CHEVALIER had yet no party for him, and that nothing could form one but the extreme violence which the whigs threatened to exercife. Great endeavors were used to engage me in this affair, and to prevail on me to anfwer the letter of invitation fent me from Bar. I alledged, as it was true, that I had no commission from any person in England, and that the friends I left behind me were the only perfons who could determine me, if any could, to take fuch a ftep. As to the laft proposition, I absolutely refufed it.

In the uncertainty of what would happen, whether the profecutions would be pushed, which was most probable, in the manner intended against me, and against others, for all of whom, except the earl of OXFORD, I had as much concern as for myfelf; or whether the whigs would relent, drop fome, and foften the fate of others ; I refolved to conduct myfelf fo as to create no appearance which might be E 2 ftrained ftrained into a pretence for hard ufage, and which might be retorted on my friends when they debated for me, or when they defended themfelves. I faw the earl of STAIR, I promifed him that I would enter into no jacobite-engagements, and I kept my word with him. I writ a letter to Mr. fecretary STANHOPE, which might take off any imputation of neglect of the government; and I retired into Dauphiné to remove the objection of refidence near the court of France.

THIS retreat from Paris was cenfured in England, and fliled a defertion of my friends and of their caufe : with what foundation let any reafonable man determine. Had I engaged with the pretender before the party acted for him, or required of me that I fhould do fo, I had taken the air of being his man; whereas I looked on myfelf as theirs : I had gone about to bring them into his meafures; whereas I never intended, even fince that time, to do any thing more than to make him as far as poffible act conformably to their views.

DURING the fhort time I continued on the banks of the Rhone, the profecutions were carried on at Weftminfter with the utmost violence, and the ferment among the people was rifen to fuch a degree, that it could end in nothing better, it might have ended in fomething worfe, than it did. The meafures which I obferved at Paris had turned to no account; on the contrary, the letter which I writ to Mr. fecretary STANHOPE was quoted as a bafe and fawning fubmission: and what I intended as a mark of respect to the government, and a fervice to my friends, was perverted to ruin me in the opinion of the latter. The act of attainder, in confequence of my impeachment, had passed against me, for crimes of the blackest dye: and among other inducements to pass it, my having been engaged in the pretender's intereft intereft was one. How well founded this article was has already appeared; I was juft as guilty of the reft. The correfpondence with me was, you know, neither frequent nor fafe. I heard feldom and darkly from you, and tho I faw well enough which way the current ran, yet I was entirely ignorant of the meafures you took, and of the ufe you intended to make of me. I contented my felf, therefore, with letting you all know that you had but to command me, and that I was ready to venture in your fervice the little which remained, as frankly as I had expofed all which was gone. At laft your commands came, and I fhall fhew you in what manner I executed them.

THE perfon who was fent to me arrived in the beginning of July one thousand feven hundred and fifteen at the place where I was. He fpoke in the name of all the friends whofe authority could influence me, and he brought me word that Scotland was not only ready to take arms, but under fome fort of diffatisfaction to be withheld from beginning; that in England the people were exafperated against the government to fuch a degree, that far from wanting to be encouraged, they could not be reftrained from infulting it on every occafion ; that the whole tory party was become avowedly jacobite; that many officers of the army, and the majority of the foldiers were very well affected to the caufe; that the city of London was ready to rife, and that the enterprifes for feifing of feveral places were ripe for execution : in a word, that most of the principal tories were in a concert with the duke of ORMOND, for I had prefied particularly to be informed whether his grace acted alone, or if not, who were his council; and that the others were fo difposed that there remained no doubt of their joining as foon as the first blow fhould be ftruck. He added, that my friends were a little furprifed to obferve that I lay neuter in fuch a conjuncture. He.

He represented to me the danger I ran of being prevented by people of all fides from having the merit of engaging early in this enterprife; and how unaccountable it would be for a man impeached and attainted under the prefent government to take no share in bringing about a revolution fo near at hand and fo certain. He entreated that I would defer no longer to join the CHEVALIER; to advise and affift in carrying on his affairs, and to follicite and negotiate at the court of France, where my friends imagined that I should not fail to meet with a favorable reception, and from whence they made no doubt of receiving affiftance in a fituation of affairs fo critical, fo unexpected, and fo promifing. He concluded by giving me a letter from the pretender, whom he had feen in his way to me, in which I was preffed to repair without lofs of time to Commercy : and this inftance was grounded on the meffage which the bearer of the letter had brought me from my friends in England. Since he was fent to me, it had been more proper to have come directly where I was : but he was in hafte to make his own court, and to deliver the affurances which were entrusted to him. Perhaps too, he imagined that he fhould tie the knot faster on me by acquainting me that my friends had actually engaged for themfelves and me, than by barely telling me that they defired I would engage for myfelf and them.

In the progrefs of the converfation he related a multitude of facts, which fatisfied me as to the general difposition of the people; but he gave me little fatisfaction as to the measures taken for improving this difposition; for driving the bufines on with vigor if it tended to a revolution, or for supporting it with advantage if it spun into a war. When I questioned him concerning several perfons whose difinclination to the government admitted of no doubt, and whose names, quality, and experience were very effectial to the fucces fuccess of the undertaking, he owned to me, that they kept a great referve, and did at most but encourage others to act, by general and dark expressions.

I RECEIVED this account and this fummons ill in my bed : yet important as the matter was, a few minutes ferved to determine me. The circumstances wanting to form a reafonable inducement to engage did not escape me. But the fmart of a bill of attainder tingled in every vein : and I looked on my party to be under oppression, and to call for my affistance. Befides which, I confidered first that I should certainly be informed, when I conferred with the CHEVALIER, of many particulars unknown to this gentleman; for I did not imagine that you could be fo near to take arms, as he reprefented you to be on no other foundation than that which he exposed : and fecondly, that I was obliged in honor to declare, without waiting for a more particular information of what might be expected from England; fince my friends had taken their refolution to declare, without any previous affurance of what might be expected from France. This fecond motive weighed extremely with me at that time: there is however more found than fenfe in it, and it contains the original error to which all your fubsequent errors, and the thread of misfortunes which followed are to be afcribed.

My refolution thus taken, I loft no time in repairing to Commercy. The very first conversations with the CHEVALIER answered in no degree my expectations: and I affure you with great truth, that I began even then, if not to repent of my own rashness, yet to be fully convinced both of yours and mine.

know for which: and when he entered into the particulars of his affairs, I found that concerning the former he had nothing more circumftantial nor politive to go upon, than what I had already heard. The advices which were fent from thence contained fuch affurances of fuccels, as it was hard to think that men, who did not go upon the fureft grounds, would prefume to give. But then these affurances were general, and the authority feldom fatisfactory. Those which came from the best hand were verbal, and often conveyed by very doubtful messens; others came from men whose fortunes were as desperate as their councils; and others came from perfons whose fituation in the world gave little reason to attend to their judgment in matters of this kind.

THE duke of ORMOND had been for fome time, I cannot fay how long, engaged with the CHEVALIER. He had taken the direction of this whole affair, as far as it related to England, upon himfelf, and had received a commission for this purpose which contained the most ample powers that could be given. After this one would be apt to imagine, that the principles on which the pretender flould proceed, and the tories engage in this fervice, had been laid down; that a regular and certain method of correspondence had been nestablished; that the necessary affistances had been specified, and that politive affurances had been given of them. Nothing lefs. In a matter as ferious as this, all was loofe and abandoned to the disposition of fortune. The first point had never been touched upon. By what I have faid above you fee how little care was taken of the fecond : and as, to the third, the duke had afked a fmall body of regular forces, a a fum of money, and a quantity of arms and ammunition. He had been told in answer by the court of France, that he must absolutely despair of any number of troops whatever, but he had been made in general to hope for fome money, fome 3 fome arms, and fome ammunition : a little fum had, I think, been advanced to him. In a cafe fo plain as this, it is hard to conceive how any man could err. The affiftances demanded from France at this time, and even greater than thefe, will appear, in the fequel of this relation, by the fenfe of the whole party to have been deemed effentially neceffary to fuccefs. In fuch an uncertainty therefore, whether even these could be obtained, or rather with so much reason to apprehend that they could not, it was evident that the tories ought to have lain ftill. They might have helped the ferment against the government, but should have avoided with the utmost care the giving any alarm, or even fuspicion of their true defign, and have refumed or not refumed it as the CHEVALIER was able or not able to provide the troops, the arms, the money, &c. Instead of which those who were at the head of the undertaking, and therefore answerable for the meafures which were purfued, fuffered the bufinefs to jog merrily on. They knew in general how little dependence was to be placed on foreign fuccour, but acted as if they had been fure of it : while the party were rendered fanguine by their passions, and made no doubt of subverting a government they were angry with, both one and the other made as much buftle, and gave as great alarm as would have been imprudent even at the eve of a general infurrection. This appeared to me to be the state of things with respect to England, when I arrived at Commercy.

THE Scots had long prefied the CHEVALIER to come amongst them, and had of late fent frequent messages to quicken his departure, fome of which were delivered in terms much more zealous than respectful. The truth is, they feemed in as much hafte to begin, as if they had thought themfelves able to do the work alone; as if they had been apprehensive of no danger but that of seeing it taken out Vol. I. F

of their hands, and of having the honor of it fhared by others. However, that which was wanting on the part of England was not wanting in Scotland : the Scots talked aloud, but they were in a condition to rife. They took little care to keep their intentions fecret, but they were difpofed to put those intentions into immediate execution, and thereby to render the fecret no longer necessary. They knew upon whom to depend for every part of the work, and they had concerted with the CHEVALIER even to the place of his landing.

THERE was need of no great fagacity to perceive how unequal fuch foundations were to the weight of the building defigned to be raifed on them. The Scots with all their zeal and all their valour could bring no revolution about, unless in concurrence with the English : and among the latter nothing was ripe for fuch an undertaking but the temper of the people, if that was fo. I thought therefore, that the pretender's friends in the north fhould be kept from rifing, till those in the south had put themselves in a condition to act; and that in the mean while, the utmost endeavors ought to be used with the king of France to espouse the cause; and that a plan of the defign, with a more particular specification of the fuccours defired, as well as of the time when, and the place to which they fhould be conveyed, ought to be writ for : all which, I was told by the marshal of BERWIC who had the principal direction at that time of these affairs in France, and I dare fay very truly, had been often afked but never fent. I looked on this enterprife to be of the nature of those which can hardly be undertaken more than once; and I judged that the fuccefs of it would depend on timing, as near as possible together, the infurrection in both parts of the island, and the fuccours from hence. The pretender approved this opinion of mine. He inftructed me accord-accordingly: and I left Lorain after having accepted the feals much against my inclination. I made one condition with him. It was this: that I should be at liberty to quit a flation which my humor and many other confiderations made me think myfelf very unfit for, whenever the occasion upon which I engaged was over, one way or other : and I defire you to remember that I did fo.

I ARRIVED at Paris towards the end of July one thousand feven hundred and fifteen. You will observe that all I was charged with, and all by confequence that I am anfwerable for, was to follicit this court, and to difpose them to grant us the fuccours neceffary to make the attempt, as foon as we fhould know certainly from England in what it was defired that these fuccours should confist, and whither they should be fent. Here I found a multitude of people at work, and every one doing what feemed good in his own eyes : no fubordination, no order, no concert. Perfons, concerned in the management of these affairs upon former occasions, have affured me this is always the cafe. It might be fo to fome degree ; but I believe never fo much as now. The jacobites had wrought one another up to look on the fuccefs of the prefent defigns as infallible. Every meeting-houfe which the populace demolished, every little drunken riot which happened, ferved to confirm them in these fanguine expectations : and there was hardly one amongft them who would lofe the air of contributing by his intrigues to the reftoration, which he took it for granted would be brought about without him in a very few weeks.

CARE and hope fat on every bufy irifh face. Those who could write and read had letters to fhew, and those who had not arrived to this pitch of erudition had their fecrets to whifper. No fex was excluded from this ministry. FANNY OGLE-

OGLETHORP, whom you must have feen in England, kept her corner in it, and OLIVE TRANT was the great wheel of our machine.

I IMAGINE that this picture, the lines of which are not in the leaft too ftrong, would ferve to reprefent what paffed on your fide of the water at the fame time. The letters which came from thence feemed to me to contain rather fuch things as the writers wished might be true, than such as they knew to be fo; and the accounts which were fent from hence were of the fame kind. The vanity of fome, and the credulity of others fupported this ridiculous correspondence, and I question not but very many perfons, some such I have known, did the fame thing from a principle which they took to be a very wife one : they imagined that they helped by thefe means to maintain and to encreafe the fpirit of the party in England and France. They acted like THOAS, that turbulent Aetolian, who brought ANTIOCHUS into Greece : " qui-" bus mendaciis de rege, multiplicando verbis copias ejus, " erexerat multorum in Graecia animos; iifdem & regis " fpem inflabat, omnium votis eum arcessi." Thus were numbers of people employed under a notion of advancing the business, or from an affectation of importance, in amufing and flattering one another, and in founding the alarm in the ears of an enemy, whom it was their interest to furprife. The government of England was put on it's guard : and the neceffity of acting, or of laying afide with some difadvantage all thoughts of acting for the prefent, was precipitated before any measures necessary to enable you to act had been prepared or almost thought of.

IF his majefty did not, till fome fhort time after this, declare the intended invafion to parliament, it was not for want of information. Before I came to Paris, what was doing had been diffcovered.

difcovered. The little armament made at the Havre which furnifhed the only means the CHEVALIER then had for his transportation into Britain, which had exhausted the treafury of St. Germains, and which contained all the arms and ammunition that could be depended upon for the whole undertaking, tho they were hardly fufficient to begin the work even in Scotland, was talked of publicly. A minister lefs alert and lefs capable than the earl of STAIR would easily have been at the bottom of the fecret; for so it was called, when the particulars of messages received and fent, the names of the perfons from whom they came, and by whom they were carried, were whispered about at tea-tables and in coffeehouses.

In fhort ; what by the indifcretion of people here, what by the rebound which came often back from London, what by the private interefts and ambitious views of perfons in the french court, and what by other caufes unneceffary to be examined now, the most private transactions came to light : and they who imagined that they trusted their heads to the keeping of one or two friends, were in reality at the mercy of numbers. Into fuch company was I fallen, for my fins : and it is upon the credit of fuch a mob-ministry, that the tories have judged me capable of betraying a trust, or incapable of difcharging it.

I HAD made very little progrefs in the bufinefs which brought me to Paris, when the paper fo long expected was fent, in purfuance of former inftances, from England. The unanimous fenfe of the principal perfons engaged was contained in it. The whole had been dictated word for word to the gentleman who brought it over by the earl of MAR, and it had been delivered to him by the duke of ORMOND. I was driving in the wide ocean without a compafs, when this this dropped unexpectedly into my hands. I received it joyfully, and I fteered my courfe exactly by it. Whether the perfons from whom it came purfued the principles, and obferved the rules which they laid down as the meafures of their own conduct and of ours, will appear by the fequel of this relation.

THIS memorial afferted, that there were no hopes of fucceeding in a prefent undertaking, for many reasons deduced in it without an immediate and univerfal rifing of the people in all parts of England upon the CHEVALIER's arrival, and that this infurrection was in no degree probable unlefs he brought a body of regular troops along with him : that if this attempt miscarried, his cause and his friends, the englifh liberty and government, would be utterly ruined : but if by coming without troops he refolved to rifque thefe and every thing elfe, he must fet out so as not to arrive before the end of September, O. S. to justify which opinion many arguments were urged. In this cafe twenty thousand arms, a train of artillery, five hundred officers with their fervants, and a confiderable fum of money were demanded : and as foon as they should be informed, that the CHEVALIER was in condition to make this provision, it was faid that notice fhould be given him of the places to which he might fend, and of the perfons who were to be trufted. I do not mention fome inconveniencies which they touched upon arifing from a delay. Becaufe their opinion was clearly for this delay, and because they could not suppose that the CHEVALIER would act, or that those about him would advise him to act, contrary to the fense of all his friends in England. No time was loft in making the proper use of this paper. As much of it as was fit to be shewn to this court was translated into French and laid before the king of France. I was now able

THE propofal of violating treaties fo lately and fo folemnly concluded, was a very bold one to be made to people, whatever their inclinations might be, whom the war had reduced to the loweft ebb of riches and power. They would not hear of a direct and open engagement, fuch as the fending a body of troops would have been, neither would they grant the whole of what was asked in the second plan. But it was impoffible for them or any one elfe to forefee how far those steps which they were willing to take, well improved, might have encouraged or forced them to go. They granted us fome fuccours, and the very fhip in which the pretender was to transport himself was fitted out by DEPINE D'ANICANT at the king of France's expence. They would have concealed thefe appearances as much as they could; but the heat of the whigs and the refentment of the court of England might have drawn them in. We fhould have been glad indirectly to concur in fixing thefe things upon them : and in a word, if the late king had lived fix months longer, I verily believe there had been war again between England and France. This was the only point of time when these affairs had, to my apprehension, the least reasonable appearance even of poffibility : all that preceded was wild and uncertain : all that followed was mad and defperate. But this favorable aspect had an extreme short duration. Two events soon happened, one of which caft a damp on all we were doing, and the other rendered vain and fruitless all we had done. The first was the arrival of the duke of ORMOND in France, the other was the death of the king.

WE had founded the duke's name high. His reputation and the opinion of his power were great. The French began to believe, that he was able to form and to head a party; that the troops would join him; that the nation would follow the fignal whenever he drew his fword; and the voice of the people, the echo of which was continually in their ears, confirmed them in this belief. But when in the midft of all thefe bright ideas they faw him arrive, almost literally alone, when to excufe his coming, I was obliged to tell them, that he could not ftay; they funk at once from their hopes: and that which generally happens happened in this cafe; becaufe they had had too good an opinion of the caufe, they began to form too bad an one. Before this time, if they had no friendship for the tories, they had at least fome confideration and efteem. After this, I faw nothing but compaffion in the best of them, and contempt in the others.

WHEN I arrived at Paris, the king was already gone to Marly, where the indifpolition which he had begun to feel at Verfailles increased upon him. He was the best friend the CHEVALIER had : and when I engaged in this bufinefs, my principal dependence was on his perfonal character. This failed me to a great degree : he was not in a condition to exert the fame vigor as formerly. The ministers who faw fo great an event as his death to be probably at hand, a certain minority, an uncertain regency, perhaps confusion, at best a new face of government and a new fystem of affairs, would not, for their own fakes, as well as for the fake of the public, venture to engage far in any new measures. All I had to negotiate by myfelf first, and in conjunction with the duke of ORMOND foon afterwards, languished with the king. My hopes funk as he declined, and died when he expired. The event of things has fufficiently fhewn, that all those which were entertained by the duke and the jacobite party under the regency were founded on the groffeft delufions imaginable. Thus was the project become impracticable before the time time arrived, which was fixed by those who directed things in England, for putting it in execution.

THE new government of France appeared to me like a ftrange country; I was little acquainted with the roads. Most of the faces I met with were unknown to me, and I hardly underftood the language of the people. Of the men who had been in power under the late reign, many were difcarded, and most of the others were too much taken up with the thoughts of fecuring themfelves under this, to receive applications in favor of the pretender. The two men who had the greatest appearance of favor and power were d'Agu-ESSSAU and NOAILLES. One was made chancellor, on the death of VOISIN, from attorney general; and the other was placed at the head of the treasury. The first passes for a man of parts, but he never acted out of the sphere of the law: I had no acquaintance with him before this time; and when you confider his circumstances and mine, you will not think it could be very eafy for me to get accefs to him now. The latter I had known extremely well whilft the late king lived : and from the fame court principle, as he was glad to be well with me then, he would hardly know me now. The * minister who had the principal direction of foreign affairs I lived in friendship with, and I must own to his honor, that he never encouraged a defign, which he knew that his court had no intention of fupporting.

- THERE were other perfons, not to tire you with farther particulars upon this head, of credit and influence, with whom I found indirect and private ways of conversing: but it was in vain to expect any more than civil language from them, in a cafe which they found no disposition in their mafter to countenance, and in favor of which they had no prejudices of their own. The private engagements into which the duke of ORLEANS had entered with his majefty, during the life of the late king, will abate of their force as the regent grows into ftrength, and would foon have had no force at all if the pretender had met with fuccefs: but in thefe beginnings they operated very ftrongly. The air of this court was to take the counterpart of all which had been thought right under LEWIS the fourteenth. " Cela refemble trop " à l'ancien fyftème," was an anfwer fo often given, that it became a jeft, and almost a proverb. But to finish this account with a fact which is incredible, but ftrictly true; the very peace, which had faved France from ruin, and the makers of it, were become as unpopular at this court, as at the court of Vienna.

THE duke of ORMOND flattered himfelf in this flate of things, that he had opened a private and fure channel of arriving at the regent, and of bending him to his purpofes. His grace and I lived together at this time in an houfe which one of my friends had lent me. I obferved that he was frequently loft, and that he made continual excurfions out of town, with all the myfterious precaution imaginable. I doubted at first, whether these intrigues related to bufines or pleasure. I foon discovered with whom they were carried on, and had reason to believe that both were mingled in them. It is necessary that I explain this fecret to you.

MRS. TRANT, whom I have named above, had been preparing herfelf for the retired abstemious life of a * carmelite, by taking a furfeit of the pleafures of Paris; when a little before the death of the queen, or about that time, the went into England. What the was entrusted, either by the CHE-VALIER, or any other perfon, to negotiate there, I am ignorant of, and it imports not much to know. In that journey fhe made or renewed an acquaintance with the duke of ORMOND. The fcandalous chronicle affirms, that she brought with her, when the returned into France, a woman, of whom I have not the leaft knowledge, but who was probably handfome; fince without beauty, fuch a merchandife would not have been faleable, nor have anfwered the defign of the importer : and that fhe made this way her court to the regent. Whatever her merit was fhe kept a correspondence with him, and put herfelf upon that foot of familiarity, which he permits all those who contribute to his pleafures to assume. She was placed by him, as fhe told me herfelf, where I found her fome time after that which I am fpeaking of, in the houfe of an antient gentlewoman, who had formerly been maid of honor to Madame, and who had contracted at court a fpirit of intrigue, which accompanied her in her retreat.

THESE two had affociated to them the abbé de TESIEU, in all the political parts of their bufinefs; for I will not fuppofe that fo reverend an ecclefiaftic entered into any other fecret. This abbé is the regent's fecretary: and it was chiefly through him that the private treaty had been carried on between his mafter and the earl of STAIR in the king's reign. Whether the prieft had flooped at the lure of a cardinal's hat, or whether he acted the fecond part by the fame orders that he acted the firft, I know not. This is fure, and the britifh minifter was not the bubble of it, that whilft he concerted meafures on one hand to traverfe the pretender's defigns, he teftified on the other all the inclination poftible to his fervice. A mad fellow, who had been an intendant in Normandy, and feveral other politicians of the loweft form, were at different times taken into this famous junto.

WITH

WITH these worthy people his grace of ORMOND negotiated, and no care was omitted on his part to keep me out of the secret. The reason of which, as far as I am able to guess at, shall be explained to you by and by. I might very justly have taken this proceeding ill, and the duke will not be able to find in my whole conduct towards him any thing like it: I protest to you very fincerely I was not in the least moved at it.

HE advanced not a ftep in his bufinefs with thefe fham minifters, and yet imagined that he got daily ground. I made no progrefs with the true ones, but I faw it. Thefe, however, were not our only difficulties. We lay under another, which came from your fide, and which embarraffed us more. The first hindered us from working forward to our point of view, but the fecond took all point of view from us.

A PAPER was fent into England juft before the death of the king of France, which had been drawn by me at Chaville in concert with the dukes of ORMOND and BERWIC, and with monfieur de TORCY. This paper was an anfwer to the memorial received from thence. The flate of this country was truly reprefented in it : the difference was fixt between what had been afked, and what might be expected from France, and upon the whole it was demanded what our friends would do, and what they would have us to do? The reply to this came through the french fecretary of flate to our hands. They declared themfelves unable to fay any thing, till they fhould fee what turn affairs would take on fo great an event as the death of the king, the report of which had reached them.

SUCH a declaration fhut our mouths and tied our hands. I confefs I knew neither how to folicit, nor what to folicit; this this last meffage suspending the project on which we had acted before, and which I kept as an inftruction conftantly before my eyes. It feemed to me uncertain, whether you intended to go on, or whether your defign was to ftifle as much as possible all past transactions; to lie perfectly still; to throw upon the court the odium of having given a falfe alarm, and to wait till new accidents at home, and a more favorable conjuncture abroad, might tempt you to refume the enterprife. Perhaps this would have been the wifeft game you could have played : but then, you should have concerted it with us who acted for you here. You intended no fuch thing, as appeared afterwards: and therefore, those who acted for the party at London, whoever they were, must be deemed inexcufable for leaving things on the foot of this meffage, and giving us no advice fit to be depended upon for many weeks. Whilft preparations were to be made, and the work was to be fet a going by affiftance from hence, you might reafonably expect to hear from us, and to be determined by us: but when all hopes of this kind feemed to be gone, it was your part to determine us, and we could take no refolution here, but that of conforming ourfelves to whatever should come prefcribed from England.

WHILST we were in this condition, the moft defperate that can be imagined, we began to receive verbal meffages from you that no more time was to be loft, and that the CHEVA-LIER fhould come away. No man was, I believe, ever fo embarraffed as I found myfelf at that time. I could not imagine that you would content yourfelves by loofe verbal meffages, after all that had happened, to call us over, and I know by experience how little fuch meffages are to be depended on. For foon after I engaged in thefe affairs, a monk arrived at Bar, difpatched, as he affirmed, by the duke of ORMOND, in whofe name he infifted that the CHEVALIER fhould fhould haften into Britain, and that nothing but his prefence was wanting to place the crown on his head. The fellow delivered his errand fo positively, and fo circumftantially, that the refolution was taken at Bar to fet out, and my rendezvous to join the CHEVALIER was appointed me. This method to fetch a king with as little ceremony as one would invite a friend to fupper, appeared fomewhat odd to me, who was then very new in these affairs. But when I came to talk with the man, for by good luck he had been fent for from Bar to Paris, I eafily difcerned that he had no fuch commission as he pretended to, and that he acted of his own head. I prefumed to oppose the taking any resolution upon his word, tho he was a monk; and foon after we knew from the duke of ORMOND himfelf, that he had never fent him.

THIS example made me cautious, but that which determined my opinion was, that I could never imagine, without fuppofing you all run mad, that the fame men who judged this attempt unripe for execution, unless fupported by regular troops from France, or at least by all the other affistances which are enumerated 'above, while the defign was much more fecret than at prefent, when the king had no fleet at fea, nor more than eight thousand men dispersed over the whole island, when we had the good wifhes of the french court on our fide, and were fure of fome particular affiftances, and of a general connivance; that the fame men, I fay, fhould prefs for making it now without any other preparation, when we had neither money, arms, ammunition, nor a fingle company of foot, when the government of England was on it's guard, national troops were raifed, foreign forces fent for, and France, like all the reft of the continent, against us. I could not conceive fuch a strange combination of accidents as should make the necessity of acting encrease gradually upon us, as the means of doing fo were taken from us.

UPON

UPON the whole matter, my opinion was, and I did not obferve the duke of ORMOND to differ from me, that we fhould wait till we heard from you, in fuch a manner as might affure us of what you intended to do yourfelves, and of what you expected from us, and that in the mean while we fhould go as far as the little money which we had, and the little favor which was fhewn us would allow, in getting fome embarkations ready on the coaft.

SIR GEORGE BYNG had come into the road of Havre, and had demanded by name feveral fhips which belonged to us, to be given up to him. The regent did not think fit to let him have the fhips; but he ordered them to be unloaded, and their cargoes were put into the king's magazines. We were in no condition to repair the lofs; and therefore, when I mention embarkations, you will pleafe to underftand nothing more than veffels to transport the pretender's perfon, and the perfons of those who should go over with him. This was all we could do, and this was not neglected.

WE were thus employed, when a gentleman arrived from Scotland to reprefent the flate of that country, and to require a definitive anfwer from the CHEVALIER, whether he would have the infurrection to be made immediately, which they apprehended they might not be able to make at all, if they were obliged to defer it much longer. This gentlemans was fent inflantly back again, and was directed to let the perfons he came from know, that the CHEVALIER was defirous to have the rifing of his friends in England and Scotland fo adjufted, that they might mutually affift each other, and diffract the enemy; that he had not received a final anfwer from his friends in England, but that he was in daily expectation of it; that it was very much to be wifhed, that all attempts in Scotland could be fufpended till fuch time as the Englifh

English were ready; but that if the Scots were so pressed that they must either submit or rise immediately, he was of opinion they should rise, and he would make the best of his way to them.

WHAT this forwardness in the Scots, and this uncertainty and backwardness in the English must produce, it was not hard to forefee; and therefore, that I might neglect nothing in my power to prevent any falfe measures, as I was confcious to myfelf that I had neglected nothing to promote true ones, I difpatched a gentleman to London, where I fuppofed the earl of MAR to be, fome days before the meffage I have just spoken of was sent to Scotland. I defired him to make my compliments to lord MAR, and to tell him from me, that I underftood it to be his fenfe, as well as the fenfe of all our friends, that Scotland could do nothing effectually without the concurrence of England, and that England would not ftir without affistance from abroad : that he might affure himfelf no fuch affiftance could be depended upon, and that I begged of him to make the inference from these propoli-The gentleman went, but upon his arrival at Lontions. don, he found that the earl of MAR was already fet out to draw the Highlanders into arms. He communicated his meffage to a perfon * of confidence, who undertook to fend it after his lordship, and this was the utmost which either he or I could do in fuch a conjuncture.

You were now visibly departed from the very scheme which you had sent us over, and from all the principles which had been ever laid down. I did what I could to keep up my own spirit as well as the spirits of the CHEVALIER and of all those with whom I was in correspondence: I endeavoured even to deceive myself. I could not remedy the mischief, and I was resolved to see the conclusion of the perilous adventure. But I own to you, that I thought then, and that I have not changed my opinion fince, that fuch meafures as thefe would not be purfued, by any reafonable man, in the most common affairs of life. It was with the utmost aftonifhment that I faw them purfued, in the conduct of an enterprife which had for it's object nothing lefs than the difposition of crowns, and for the means of bringing it about nothing lefs than a civil war.

IMPATIENT that we heard nothing from England, when we expected every moment to hear that the war was begun in Scotland; the duke of ORMOND and I refolved to fend a perfon * of confidence to London. We inftructed him to repeat to you the former accounts, which we had fent over, to let you know how destitute the CHEVALIER was, either of actual fupport, or even of reasonable hopes, and to defire that you would determine whether he fhould go to Scotland, or throw himfelf on fome part of the english coast. This perfon was farther instructed to tell you, that the CHEVALIER being ready to take any refolution at a moment's warning, you might depend on his fetting out the inftant he received your answer: and therefore, that to fave time, if your intention was to rife, you would do well to act immediately, on the affurance that the plan you prefcribed, be it what it would, should be exactly complied with. We took this refolution the rather, becaufe one of the pacquets which had been prepared in cypher, to give you an account of things which had been put above three weeks before into monfieur de Torey's hands, and which by confequence we thought to be in yours, was by this time fent back to me by this minister, I think open, with an excuse that he durst not take upon him to forward it.

THE perfon difpatched to London returned very foon to us, and the anfwer he brought was *, that fince affairs grew daily worfe, and could not mend by delay, our friends in England had refolved to declare immediately, and that they would be ready to join the CHEVALIER on his landing: that his perfon would be as fafe there as in Scotland, and that in every other refpect, it was better that he fhould land in England; that they had ufed their utmoft endeavors, and that they hoped the weftern counties were in a good pofture to receive him. To this was added, a general indication of the place he fhould come to, as near to Plymouth as poffible.

You must agree, that this was not the answer of men who knew what they were about. A little more precifion was neceffary in dictating a meffage, which was to have fuch confequences : and especially fince the gentleman could not fail to acquaint the perfons he fpoke with, that the CHE-VALIER was not able to carry men enough to fecure him from being taken up, even by the first constable. Notwithstanding this, the duke of ORMOND fet out from Paris, and the CHEVALIER from Bar. Some perfons were fent to the north of England, and others to London, to give notice that they were both on their way. Their routs were fo ordered, that the duke of ORMOND was to fail from the coaft of Normandy fome days before the CHEVALIER arrived at St. Malo, to which place the duke was to fend immediate notice of his landing; and two gentlemen acquainted with the country, and perfectly well known to all our friends in those parts, were difpatched before, that the people of Devonshire and Somerfetshire, who were, we concluded, in arms, might be apprifed of the fignals which were to be made from the fhips, and might be ready to receive the duke.

SIR WILLIAM WINDHAM.

On the coaft of France, and before his embarkation, the duke heard that feveral of our principal friends had been feifed, immediately after the perfon who came laft from them had left London; that the others were all difperfed, and that the confernation was univerfal. He embarked notwithftanding this melancholy news, and, fupported by nothing but the firmnefs of his temper, he went over to the place appointed: he did more than his part, and he found that our friends had done lefs than theirs. One of the gentlemen who had paffed over before him, and had traverfed part of the country, joined him on the coaft, and affured him that there was not the leaft room to expect a rifing. In a word, he was refufed a night's lodging in a country which we had been told was in a good pofture to receive the CHEVALIER, and where the duke expected that multitudes would repair to him.

HE returned to the coaft of Britany after this uncomfortable expedition, where the CHEVALIER arrived about the fame time from Lorain. What his grace proposed by the fecond attempt, which he made as foon as the veffel could be refitted, to land in the fame part of the island, I profess myself to be ignorant. I writ him my opinion at the time, and I have always thought, that the florm in which he had like to have been caft away, and which forced him back to the french coaft, faved him from a much greater peril, that of perifhing in an attempt as full of extravagant rafhness, and as void of all reafonable meaning, as any of those adventures which have rendered the hero of La Mancha immortal.

THE CHEVALIER had now but one of these two things left him to do, one was to return to Bar, the other was to go to Scotland, where there were people in arms for him. He took this last resolution. He left Britany, where he had as many ministers as there were people about him, and where he was H 2 eternally eternally teifed with noify difputes about what was to be done, in circumftances in which no reafonable thing could be done. He fent to have a veffel got ready for him at Dunkirk, and he croffed the country as privately as he could.

WHILST all these things passed. I remained at Paris, to try, if by any means some affistance might be at last procured; without which it was evident, even to those who flattered themselves the most, that the game was up.

No fooner was the duke of ORMOND gone from Paris, on the defign which I have mentioned, and Mrs. TRANT, who had accompanied him part of the way, returned, but I wasfent for to a little house at Madrid in the Bois de Boulogne, where she lived with mademoifelle de CHAUSSERV, the antient gentlewoman with whom the duke of ORLEANS had placed her. These two perfons opened to me what had passed whilft the duke of ORMOND was there, and the hopes they had of drawing the regent into all the measures necessary to support the attempts, which were making in favor of the CHEVALIER.

By what they told me at first, I faw that they had been trufted; and by what passed in the course of my treating with them, it appeared, that they had the access which they pretended to. All which I had been able to do by proper perfons and in proper methods, fince the king of France's death, amounting to little or nothing, I refolved, at last, to try what was to be done by this indirect way. I put myfelf under the conduct of these female managers, and without having the fame dependence on them as his grace of ORMOND had, I pushed their credit and their power as far as they reached, during the time I continued to fee them. I met with souther language and greater hopes than had been given me hitherto. A note figned by the regent, supposed to

to be writ to a woman, but which was to be explained to be: intended for the earl of MAR, was put into my hands to be fent to Scotland. I took a copy of it, which you may fee at the end of these papers *. When Sir JOHN ARESKINE came to prefs for fuccor, the regent was prevailed upon by thefe women to fee him, but he carried nothing real back with him, except a quantity of gold, part of the money which we had. drawn from Spain, and which was loft with the veffel in a very odd manner on the fcotch coaft. The duke of ORMOND. had been promifed feven or eight thousand arms, which were drawn out of the magazines, and faid to be lodged, I think, at Compeigne. I used my utmost efforts, that these arms might be carried forward to the coaft, and I undertook for. their transportation : but all was in vain ; fo that the likelihood of bringing any thing to effect in time appeared to me no greater than I had found it before I entered into this intrigue.

I soon grew tired of a commerce, which nothing but fuccefs could render tolerable, and refolved to be no longer amufed by the pretences, which were daily repeated to me, that the regent had entertained perfonal prejudices againft me, and that he was infenfibly, and by degrees, to be dipped in our meafures; that both thefe things required time, but that they would certainly be brought about, and that we fhould then be able to anfwer all the expectations of the Englifh and the Scotch. The first of thefe pretences contained a fact, which I could hardly perfuade myfelf to be true, becaufe I knew very certainly, that I had never given his royalhighnefs the least occasion for fuch prejudices: the fecond was a work which might spin out into a great and uncertain. length. I took my refolution to drive what related to others.

to an immediate decifion, not to fuffer any excufe for doing nothing to be founded on my conduct, nor the falvation, if I could hinder it, of fo many gallant men as were in arms in Scotland, to reft on the fuccefs of fuch womanifh projects. I fhall tell you what I did on the first head now, and what I did on the fecond hereafter in its proper place.

THE fact, which it was faid the regent laid to my charge, was a correspondence with lord STAIR, and having been one night at his house, from whence I did not retire till three in the morning. As foon as I got hold of this, I defired the marshal of BERWIC to go to him. The marshal told him from me, that I had been extremely concerned, to hear in general, that I lay under his difpleafure ; that a ftory, which it was faid he believed, had been related to me; that I expected the juffice which he could deny to no man of having the accufation proved, in which cafe I was contented to pais for the last of human kind, or of being justified if it could not be proved. He answered, that such a story had been related to him by fuch perfons as he thought would not have deceived him; that he had been fince convinced, that it was false, and that I should be fatisfied of his regard for me: but that he must own he was very uneasy to find, that I, who could apply to him through the marshal D'HUXELLES, could chufe to treat with Mrs. TRANT, and the reft; for he named all the cabal, except his fecretary, whom I had never met at mademoifelle CHAUSSERY's. He added, that these people teifed him at my infligation, to death, and that they were not fit to be trufted with any business. He applied to some of them the feverest epithets. The marshal of BERWIC replied, that he was fure I fhould receive the whole of what he had been pleafed to fay with the greateft fatisfaction; that I had treated with these perfons much against my will; and finally, that if his royal highness would not employ them, he was fure fure I would never apply to them. In a converfation which I had, not long after with him, he fpoke to me in much the fame terms as he had done to the marfhal. I went from him very ill edified as to his intentions of doing any thing in favor of the CHEVALIER; but I carried away with me this fatisfaction, that he had affigned me, from his own mouth, the perfon through whom I fhould make my applications to him, and through whom I fhould depend on receiving his anfwers; that he had difavowed all the little politic clubs, and had commanded me to have no more to do with them.

BEFORE I refume the thread of my narration, give me leave to make fome reflection upon what I have been laft faying to you. When I met with the duke of ORMOND at his return from the coaft, he thought himfelf obliged to fay fomething to excufe his keeping me out of a fecret, which during his absence I had been let into. His excuse was, that the regent had exacted from him that I should know nothing of the matter. You will observe, that the account which I have given you feems to contradict this affertion of his grace, fince it is hard to fuppofe, that if the regent had exacted that I should be kept out of the fecret, these women would have dared to have let me into it; and fince it is still harder to suppose, that the regent would make this express condition with the duke of ORMOND, and the moment the duke's back was turned, would fuffer thefe women to teife him from me, and to bring me answers from him. am, however, far from taxing the duke with affirming an untruth. I believe the regent did make fuch a condition with him, and I will tell you how I understand all this little management, which will explain a great deal to you. This prince, with wit and valor, has joined all the irrefolution of temper poslible, and is, perhaps, the man in the world the leaft capable of faying no to your face. From hence hence it happened, that these women, like multitudes of other people, forced him to fay and do enough to give them the air of having credit with him, and of being trufted by him. This drew in the duke of ORMOND, who is not, I dare fay, as yet undeceived. The regent never intended from the first, to do any thing, even indirectly, in favor of the jacobite caufe. His interest was plainly on the other fide, and he faw it. But then, the fame weakness in his character carried him, as it would have done his great uncle GASTON in the fame cafe, to keep measures with the CHEVALIER. His double trimming character prevailed on him to talk with the duke of ORMOND : but it carried him no farther. I question not but he did on this occafion, what you must have observed many men to do. We not only endeavor to impofe on the world, but even on ourfelves. We difguife our weaknefs, and work up in our minds an opinion that the measure which we fall into by the natural or habitual imperfection of our character, is the effect of a principle of prudence, or of fome other virtue. Thus the regent, who faw the duke of ORMOND, because he could not reful the importunity of OLIVE TRANT, and who gave hopes to the duke, becaufe he can refuse nobody, made himfelf believe that it was a great ftrain of policy to blow up the fire, and to keep Britain embroiled. I am perfuaded that I do not err in judging that he thought in this manner; and here I fix the reafon of his excluding me out of the commerce which he had with the duke of ORMOND, of his affecting a perfonal diflike of me, and of his avoiding any correspondence with me upon these matters; till I forced myfelf in a manner upon him, and he could not keep me any longer at a diftance without depart-ing from his first principle, that of keeping measures with every body. He then threw me, or let me flide, if you will, into the hands of these women, and when he found that I preffed him hard that way too, he took me out of their hands and

and put me back again into the proper channel of bufinefs, where I had not been long, as you will fee by and by, before the fcene of amufement was finished.

SIR JOHN ARESKINE told me, when he came from the firft audience that he had of his royal highnefs, that he put him in mind of the encouragement which he had given the earl of MAR to take arms. I never heard any thing of this kind, but what Sir JOHN let drop to me. If the fact be true, you fee that the fcotch general had been amufed by him with a witnefs. The englifh general was fo in his turn, and while this was doing, the regent might think it beft to have him to himfelf. Four eyes comprehend more objects than two, and I was a little better acquainted with the characters of people, and the mafs of the country, than the duke, tho this court had been at firft a ftrange country to me in comparifon of the former.

AN infinity of little circumftances concurred to make me form this opinion, fome of which are better felt than explained, and many of which are not prefent to my memory. That which had the greateft weight with me, and which is, I think, decifive, I will mention. At the very time when it is pretended, that the regent treated with the duke of OR-MOND, on the express condition that I fhould know nothing of the matter; two * perfons of the first rank and greateft credit in this court, when I made the most prefing inftances to them in favor of the CHEVALIER, threw out in converfation to me, that I should attach myfelf to the duke of OR-LEANS, that in my circumftances I might want him, and that he might have occasion for me. Something was intimated of penfions, and eftablifhment, and of making my peace at home. I would not underftand this language, becaufe I would not break with the people who held it : and when they faw that I would not take the hints, they ceafed to give them.

I FANCY that you fee by this time the motives of the regent's conduct. I am not, I confess, able to explain to you those of the duke of ORMOND's: I cannot fo much as guess at them. When he came into France I was careful to fhew him all the friendship, and all the respect possible. My friends were his, my purfe was his, and even my bed was his. I went further, I did all those things which touch most fenfibly people who have been ufed to pomp. I made my court to him, and haunted his levee with affiduity. In return to this behavior, which was the pure effect of my good will, and which no duty that I owed his grace, no obligation that I had to him, imposed upon me; I have great reafon to fufpect, that he went at leaft half way in all that was faid or done against me. He threw himself blindly into the fnare which was laid for him, and inftead of hindring, as he and I, in concert, might have done, those affairs from languishing, in the manner they did feveral months, he furnished this court with an excuse for not treating with me, till it was too late to play even a faving game; and he neither drove the regent to affift the CHEVALIER, nor to declare that he would not affift him; tho it was fatal to the caufe in general, and to the Scotch in particular, not to bring one of the two about.

IT was Chriftmas one thousand seven hundred and fisteen before the CHEVALIER failed for Scotland. The battle of Dunblain had been fought, the business of Preston was over : there remained not the least room to expect any commotion in his favor among the English; and many of the Scotch, who had declared for him, began to grow cool in the cause. No profpect fpect of fuccefs could engage him in this expedition, but it was become neceffary for his reputation. The Scotch on one fide fpared not to reproach him, I think unjuftly, for his delay; and the French on the other were extremely eager to have him gone. Some of those who knew little of british affairs imagined, that his prefence would produce miraculous effects. You must not be furprised at this. As near neighbours as we are, ninety-nine in an hundred among the French are as little acquainted with the infide of our ifland as with that of Japan. Others of them were uneafy to fee him skulking about in France, and to be told of it every hour by the earl of STAIR. Others again imagined, that he might do their business by going into Scotland, tho he should not do his own : that is, they flattered themfelves, that he might keep a war for fome time alive, which would employ the whole attention of our government; and for the event of which they had very little concern. Unable from their natural temper, as well as their habits, to be true to any principle, they thought and acted in this manner, whilft they affected the greatest friendship to the king, and whilst they really did defire to enter into new and more intimate engagements with him. Whilft the pretender continued in France they could neither avow him nor favor his caufe : if he once fet his foot on Scotch ground, they gave hopes of indirect affistance : and if he could maintain himself in any corner of the island, they could look upon him,* it was faid, as a king. This was their language to us. To the british minister they denied, they forfwore, they renounced; and yet the + man of the best head in all their councils, being asked by lord STAIR what they intended to do, answered before he was aware, that they pretended to be neuters. I leave you to judge, how this flip was taken up.

As

As foon as I received advice that the CHEVALIER was failed from Dunkirk, I renewed, I redoubled all my applications. I neglected no means, I forgot no argument which my underftanding could fuggeft to me. What the duke of ORMOND refted upon, you have feen already; and I doubt very much whether lord MAR, if he had been here in my place, would have been able to employ meafures more effectual than thofe which I made ufe of. I may, without any imputation of arrogance, compare myfelf on this occafion with his lordfhip, fince there was nothing in the management of this affair above my degree of capacity; nothing equal, either in extent or difficulty, to the bufinefs which he was a fpectator of, and which I carried on, when we were fecretaries of flate together under the late queen.

THE king of France, who was not able to furnish the pretender with money himfelf, had writ fome time before his death to his grandfon, and had obtained a promife of four hundred thousand crowns from the king of Spain. A small part of this fum had been received by the queen's treafurer at St. Germain's, and had been either fent to Scotland or employed to defray the expences which were daily making on the coaft. I preffed the fpanish ambassador at Paris, I folicited, by LAWLESS, ALBERONI at Madrid; and I found * another more private and more promifing way of applying to him. I took care to have a number of officers picked out of the irish troops, which ferve in that country; their routs were given them, and I fent a ship to receive and transport them. The money came in fo flowly and in fuch trifling fums, that it turned to little account, and the officers were on their way when the CHEVALIER returned from Scotland.

In the fummer, endeavors had been used to prevail on the king of Sweden to transport from Gottenburg, the troops he had in that neighbourhood into Scotland, or into the north of England. He had excufed himfelf, not becaufe he difliked the proposition, which on the contrary he thought agreeable to his intereft: but for reafons of another kind. First, because the troops at hand for this service confisted in horfe, not in foot which had been asked, and which were alone proper for fuch an expedition : fecondly, becaufe a declaration of this fort might turn the protestant princes of the empire, from whole offices he had still fome prospect of affiftance, against him : and thirdly, because altho he knew that the king of Great Britain was his enemy, yet they were not in war together, nor had the latter acted yet a while openly enough against him to justify fuch a rupture. At the time I am fpeaking of, thefe reafons were removed by the king of Sweden's being beat out of the empire, by the little confequence which his management of the protestant princes was to him, and by the declaration of war which the king as elector of Hanover made. I took up this negotiation therefore again. The regent appeared to come into it. He fpoke fair to the baron de SPAR, who preffed him on his fide, as I preffed him on mine, and promifed befides the arrears of the fubfidy due to the Swedes, an immediate advance of fifty thousand crowns for the enterprise on Britain. He kept the officer who was to be difpatched I know not how long booted; fometimes on pretence, that in the low state of his credit he could not find bills of exchange for the fum, and fometimes on other pretences, and by thefe delays he evaded his promife. The French were very frank in declaring, that they could give us no money, and that they would give us no troops. Arms, ammunition and connivance, they made us hope for. The latter in fome degree we might have had, perhaps; but to what purpofe was it to connive, when by a multitude of little tricks they avoided furnishing us with arms and ammunition, and when they knew that we were utterly utterly unable to furnish ourfelves with them? I had formed the defign of engaging french privateers in the pretender's fervice. They were to have carried whatever we should have had to fend to any part of Britain in their first voyage, and after that, to have cruifed under his commission. I had actually agreed for fome, and it was in my power to have made the fame bargains with others. Sweden on one fide, and Scotland on the other, would have afforded them retreats : and if the war had been kept up in any part of the mountains, I conceive the execution of this defign would have been of the greatest advantage to the pretender. It failed, because no other part of the work went on. He was not above fix weeks in his footch expedition, and thefe were the things I endeavored to bring to bear in his absence. I had no great opinion of my fuccess before he went; but when he had made the laft ftep which it was in his power to make, I refolved to fuffer neither him nor the Scotch to be any longer bubbles of their own credulity, and of the fcandalous artifice of this court. It would be tedious to enter into a longer narrative of all the useless pains I took. To conclude therefore ; in a conversation which I had with the M. d'HUXELLES, I took occasion to declare, that I would not be the inftrument of amufing the Scotch ; and that fince I was able to do them no fervice, I would at leaft inform them, that they must flatter themfelves no longer with hopes of fuccour from France. I added, that I would fend them veffels, which with those already on the coast of Scotland, might ferve to bring off the pretender, the earl of MAR, and as many others as poffible. The marshal approved my refolution, and advifed me to execute it as the only thing which was left to do. On this occasion he shewed no referve, he was very explicite, and yet in this very point of time, the promife of an order was obtained, or pretended to be obtained from the regent, for delivering those stores of arms and

and ammunition which belonged to the CHEWALIER, and which had been put into the french magazines, when SIR GEORGE BYNG came to Havre. CASTEL BLANCO is a Spaniard who married a daughter of lord MELFORD, and who under that title set up for a medler in english business. I cannot justly tell whether the honor of obtaining this promife was afcribed to him, to the junto in the bois de Boulogne, or to any one elfe. I fuppofe they all affumed a fhare of the merit. The project was, that these should be delivered to CASTEL BLANCO; that he fhould enter into a recognifance to carry them to Spain, and from thence to the weft Indies; that I should provide a veffel for this purpose, which he should appear to hire or buy; and that when she was at fea fhe should fail directly for Scotland. You cannot believe that I reckoned much on the effect of this order : but accuftomed to concur in measures, the inutility of which I faw evidently enough, I concurred in this likewife. The neceffary care was taken, and in a fortnight's time the ship was ready to fail, and no fuspicion of her belonging to the CHEVALIER, or of her deftination, was gone abroad.

As this event made no alteration in my opinion, it made none in the difpatches which I prepared and fent to Scotland. In them I gave an account of what was in negotia-I explained to him what might be hoped for in time, tion. if he was able to maintain himfelf in the mountains without the fuccours he demanded from France. But from France I told him plainly, that it was in vain to expect the least part of them. In fhort, I concealed nothing from him. This was all I could do to put the CHEVALIER and his council in a condition to judge what measures to take : but these difpatches never came to his hands. He was failed from Scotland just before the gentleman, whom I fent, arrived on the coaft. He landed at Graveline about the twenty-fecond of February, Ŀ

February, and the first orders he gave, were to stop all the vessels which were going on his account to the country from whence he came.

I saw him the morning after his arrival at St. Germain's, and he received me with open arms. I had been, as foon as we heard of his return, to acquaint the french court with it. They were not a little uneafy, and the first thing which the M. d'HUXELLES faid to me upon it was, that the CHEVALIER ought to proceed to Bar with all the diligence poffible, and to take possession of his former afylum before the duke of Lorrain had time to defire him to look out for a refidence fome where elfe: nothing more was meaned by this propofal, than to get him out of the dominions of France immediately. I was not in my mind averfe to it for other reasons. Nothing could be more difadvantageous to him than to be obliged to pass the Alpes, or to refide in the papal territories on this fide of them. Avignon was already named for his retreat in common conversation, and I know not whether from the time he left Scotland, he ever thought of any other. I imagined, that by furprifing the duke of Lorrain we fhould furnish that prince with an excuse to the king, and to the emperor; that we might draw the matter into length, and gain time to negotiate fome other retreat than that of Avignon for the CHEVALIER. The duke's good will there was no room to doubt of, and by what the prince of Vaudemont told me at Paris fome time afterwards, I am apt to think we fhould have fucceeded. In all events it could not be wrong to try every measure, and the pretender would have gone to Avignon with much better grace, when he had done, in the fight of the world, all he could to avoid it.

I FOUND him in no difposition to make such has had a mind, on the contrary, to stay fome time at St. Germain's, and and in the neighbourhood of Paris, and to have a private meeting with the regent. He fent me back to Paris to follicit the meeting. I writ, I fpoke to the marfhal d'HUXELLES, I did beft to ferve him in his own way. The marfhal anfwered me by word of mouth, and by letter. He refufed me by both. I remember he added this circumftance, that he found the regent in bed, and acquainted him with what the CHE-VALIER defired; that the regent rofe up in a paffion, faid that the things which were afked were puerilities, and fwore that he would not fee him. I returned without having been able to fucceed in my commiffion : and I confefs I thought the want of fuccefs on this occafion no great misfortune.

It was two or three o'clock on the funday or monday morning when I parted from the pretender. He acquiefced in the determination of the regent, and declared that he would inftantly fet out for Lorain : his trunks were packed, his chaife was ordered to be at the door at five, and I fent to Paris to acquaint the minister that he was gone. He afked me how foon I fhould be able to follow him, gave me commiffions for fome things, which he defired I fhould bring after him : and in a word, no Italian ever embraced the man he was going to ftab with greater fhew of affection and confidence.

INSTEAD of taking post for Lorain, he went to the little house in the bois de Boulogne, where his female ministers refided; and there he continued lurking for feveral days, and pleasing himfelf with the air of mystery and business, whilst the only real business, which he should have had at that time, lay neglected. He saw the spanish and swedish minifters in this place. I cannot tell, for I never thought it worth asking, whether he saw the duke of ORLEANS: possibly he might. To have been teized into such a step, which sig-Vol. I: K nified nified nothing, and which gave the cabal an air of credit and importance, is agreeable enough to the levity of his royal highnefs's character.

THE thursday following the duke of ORMOND came to fee me, and after the compliment of telling me, that he believed, I should be furprifed at the message he brought, he put into my hands a note to himfelf, and a little fcrip of paper directed to me, and drawn in the ftyle of a justice of peace's warrant. They were both in the CHEVALIER's hand-writing, and they were dated on the tuefday, in order to make me believe that they had been writ on the road and fent back to the duke: his grace dropped in our conversation, with great dexterity, all the infinuations proper to confirm me in this opinion. I knew at this time his mafter was not gone, fo that he gave me two very rifible fcenes, which are frequently to be met with when fome people meddle in bufinefs ; I mean that of feeing a man labor with a great deal of aukward artifice to make a fecret of a nothing, and that of feeing yourfelf taken for a bubble, when you know as much of the matter as he who thinks that he imposes on you.

I CANNOT recollect precifely the terms of the two papers. I remember that the kingly laconic ftyle of one of them, and the expression of having no farther occasion for my fervice, made me finile. The other was an order to give up the papers in my office; all which might have been contained in a letter-case of a moderate fize. I gave the duke the feals, and some papers which I could readily come at. Some others, and indeed all such as I had not destroyed, I fent afterwards to the CHEVALIER: and I took care to convey to him, by a fase hand, feveral of his letters, which it would have been very improper the duke should have feen. I am surprised that he did not reflect on the confequence of my obeying his order literally. It depended on me to have fhewn his general what an opinion the CHEVALIER had of his capacity. I formed the trick, and would not appear piqued, when I was far from being angry. As I gave up, without foruple, all the papers which remained in my hands, becaufe I was determined never to make ufe of them; fo I confefs to you, that I took a fort of pride in never afking for those of mine, which were in the pretender's hands: I contented myself with making the duke understand how little need there was to get rid of a man in this manner, who had made the bargain which I had done at my engagement, and with taking this first opportunity to declare, that I would never more have to do with the pretender, or his cause.

THAT I might avoid being queftioned and quoted in the moft curious and the moft babling town in the world, I related what had paffed to three or four of my friends, and hardly ftirred abroad during a fortnight, out of a little lodging which very few people knew of. At the end of this term the marfhal of BERWIC came to fee me, and afked me what I meaned, to confine myfelf to my chamber, when my name was trumpeted about in all the companies of Paris, and the moft infamous flories were fpread concerning me. This was the firft notice I had, and it was foon followed by others. I appeared immediately in the world, and found there was hardly a fcurrilous tongue which had not been let loofe on my fubject, and that thofe perfons whom the duke of ORMOND and earl of MAR muft influence, or might filence, were the loudeft in defaming me.

PARTICULAR inflances wherein I had failed were cited; and as it was the fashion for every jacobite to affect being in the fecret, you might have found a multitude of vouchers to facts,

facts, which, if they had been true, could in the nature of them be known to very few perfons.

THIS method, of beating down the reputation of a man by noife and impudence, imposed on the world at first, convinced people who were not acquainted with me, and staggered even my friends. But it ceased in a few days to have any effect against me. The malice was too gross to pass upon reflection. These stores died away almost as fast as they were published, for this very reason, because they were particular

THEY gave out, for inftance, that I had taken to my own ufe, a very great fum of the CHEVALIER'S money, when it was notorious that I had fpent a great fum of my own in his fervice; and never would be obliged to him for a farthing, in which cafe, I believe, I was fingle. Upon this head it was eafy to appeal to a very honeft gentleman, the queen's treafurer at St. Germains, through whofe hands, and not through mine, went the very little money which the CHEVA-LIER had.

THEY gave out, that whilft he was in Scotland, he never heard from me, tho it was notorious that I fent him no lefs than five expresses during the fix weeks, which he confumed in this expedition. It was easy, on this head, to appeal to the perfors, to whom my dispatches had been committed.

THESE lies, and many others of the fame fort which were founded on particular facts, were difproved by particular facts, and had not time, at leaft at Paris, to make any imprefion. But the principal crime with which they charged me then, and the only one which fince that time they have infifted upon, is of another nature. This part of their accufation is general, and it cannot be refuted without doing what what I have done above, deducing feveral facts, comparing thefe facts together, and reafoning upon them; nay, that which is worfe, is, that it cannot be fully refuted without the mention of fome facts, which, in my prefent circumstances, it would not be very prudent, the I should think it very lawful for me, to divulge. You see that I mean the flarving the war in Scotland, which it is pretended might have been supported, and might have succeeded too, if I had procured the fuccors which were asked, nay, if I had fent a little powder. This the jacobites, who affect moderation and candor, fhrug their fhoulders at : they are forry for it, but lord BOLINGBROKE can never wash himself clean of this guilt; for these fuccors might have been obtained, and a proof that they might, is, that they were fo by others. These people leave the cause of this management doubtful, between my treachery and my want of capacity. The pretender, with all the falfe charity and real malice of one who fets up for devotion, attributes all his misfortunes to my negligence.

THE letters which were writ by my fecretary above a year ago into England, the marginal notes which have been made fince to the letter from Avignon, and what is faid above, have fet this affair in fo clear a light, that whoever examines, with a fair intention, muft feel the truth, and be convinced by it. I cannot, however, forbear to make fome obfervations on the fame fubject here. It is even neceffary that I fhould do fo in the defign of making this difcourfe the foundation of my juftification to the tories at prefent, and to the whole world in time.

THERE is nothing which my enemies apprehend fo much as my justification, and they have reason. But they may comfort themselves with this reflection, that it will be a misfortune, which will accompany me to my grave, that I fuffered a chain of accidents to draw me into fuch meafures and fuch company; that I have been obliged to defend myfelf againft fuch accufations and fuch accufers; that by affociating with fo much folly, and fo much knavery, I am become the victim of both; that I was diffreffed by the former, when the latter would have been lefs grievous to me, fince it is much better in bufinefs to be yoaked to knaves than fools, and that I put into their hands the means of loading me like the fcape-goat with all the evil confequences of their folly.

In the first letters which I received from the earl of MAR, he writ for arms, for ammunition, for money, for officers, and all things, frankly, as if thefe things had been ready, and I had engaged to fupply him with them, before he fet up the standard at the brae of Mar; whereas our condition could not be unknown to his lordship; and you have feen that I did all I could to prevent his reckoning on any affiftance from hence. As our hopes at this court decreafed, his lordship rofe in his demands : and at the time when it was visible that the regent intended nothing lefs than even privately and indirectly to fupport the Scotch, the pretender and the earl of MAR writ for regular forces and a train of artillery; which was in effect to infift that France should enter into a war for them. I might in answer to the first instances have afked lord MAR, what he did in Scotland? and what he meaned by drawing his countrymen into a war at this time? or at least upon this foot ? He who had dictated not long before a memorial, wherein it was afferted, that to have a profpect of fucceeding in this enterprife, there must be an universal infurrection, and that fuch an infurrection was in no fort probable, unlefs a body of troops was brought to fupport it? He who thought that the confequence of failing, when the attempt was once made, must be the utter ruin of the cause, and the loss of the

the british liberty? He who concurred in demanding as a pis-aller, and the least which could be infisted on, arms, ammunition, artillery, money, and officers? I fay, I might have asked what he meant to begin the dance when he had not the least affurance of any fuccor, but, on the contrary, the greatest reason imaginable to believe this affair was become as defperate abroad by the death of the most christian king, as it was at home by the discovery of the design, and by the measures taken to defeat it?

INSTEAD of acting this part, which would have been wife, I took that which was plaufible. I refolved to contribute all I could to fupport the bufinefs, fince it was begun. I encouraged his lordfhip as long as I had the leaft ground for doing fo, and I confirmed the pretender in his refolution of g ing to Scotland, when he had nothing better left him to do. If I have any thing to reproach myfelf with, in the whole progrefs of the war in Scotland, it is having encouraged lord MAR too long. But on the other hand, If I had given up the caufe, and had writ defpondingly to him, before this court had explained itfelf as fully as the marfhal d'HUXELLES did in the converfation which is mentioned above, it is eafy to fee what turn would have been given to fuch a conduct.

THE true caufe of all the misfortunes which happened to the Scotch, and to those who took arms in the north of England, lies here; that they rose without any previous certainty of foreign help, in direct contradiction to the scheme which their leaders themselves had formed. The excuse which I have heard made for this, is that the act of parliament for curbing the highlanders was near to be put in execution; that they would have been difarmed and entirely disabled from rifing at any other time, if they had not rose at this. You

You can judge better than I of the validity of this excufe. It feems to me, that by management they might have gained time, and that even when they had been reduced to the dilemma fuppofed, they ought to have got together under pretence of refifting the infractions of the union without any mention of the pretender, and have treated with the government on this foot. By thefe means they might probably have preferved themfelves in a condition of avowing their defign when they fhould be fure of being backed from abroad : at the worft they might have declared for the CHEVALIER when all other expedients failed them. In a word, I take this excufe not to be very good, and the true reafon of this conduct to have been the rafhnefs of the people, and the inconfiftent meafures of their head.

BUT admitting the excufe to be valid, it remains ftill an undeniable truth, that this is the original fountain from whence all thofe waters of bitternefs flowed, which fo many unhappy people have drunk of. I have faid already, that the neceffity of acting was precipitated before any meafures to act with fuccefs had been taken, and that the neceffity of doing fo feemed to increafe as the means of doing fo were taken away. To whom is this to be afcribed ? Is it to be afcribed to me, who had no fhare in thefe affairs, till a few weeks before the duke of ORMOND was forced to abandon England, and the difcovery of the intended invafion was publifhed to parliament and to the world? or is it to be afcribed to thofe who had from the first been at the head of this undertaking?

UNABLE to defend this point, the next refort of the jacobites is to this impudent and abfurd affirmation, that notwithstanding the difadvantages under which they took arms, they should have fucceeded, if the indirect affistances, which were

were asked from France, had been obtained : nay, that they fhould have been able to defend the highlands, if I had fent them a little powder. Is it possible that a man should be wounded with fuch blunt weapons? Much more than powder was asked for from the first, and I have already faid, that when the CHEVALIER came into Scotland, regular troops, artillery, &c. were demanded. Both he and the earl of MAR judged it impossible to stand their ground, without fuch affistance as these. How scandalous then must it be deemed, that they fuffer their dependents to fpread in the world, that for want of a little powder I forced them to abandon Scotland? The earl of MAR knows, that all the powder in France would not have enabled him to ftay at Perth as long as he did, if he had not had another fecurity : and when that failed him, he must have quitted the party, if the regent had given us all that he made fome of us expect.

BUT to finish all that I intend to fay on a subject which has tired me, and perhaps you ; the jacobites affirm, that the indirect assistances which they defired might have been ob-tained : and I confess, that I am inexcusable if this fact be true. To prove it, they appeal to the little politicians of whom I have fpoken fo often. I affirm, on the contrary, that nothing could be obtained here to support the Scotch, or to encourage the English. To prove the affertion, I appeal to the ministers with whom I negotiated, and to the regent himfelf, who, whatever language he may hold in private with other people, cannot controvert with me the truth of what I advance. He excluded me formerly, that he might the more eafily avoid doing any thing; and perhaps he has blamed me fince, that he might excuse his doing nothing. All this may be true, and yet it will remain true, that he would never have been prevailed upon to act directly against his VOL. I. L his intereft in the only point of view which he has, I mean the crown of France, and against the unanimous fense of all his minifters. Suppose that in the time of the late queen, when she had the peace in view, a party in France had implored her affiftance, and had applied to MARGERY FIELDING, to ISRAEL, to my lady OGLETHORPE, to Dr. BATTLE, and lieutenant general STEWART; what fuccefs do you imagine fuch applications would have had? The queen would have fpoke them fair, fhe would fpeak otherwife to no body : but do you imagine she would have made one step in their favor? OLIVE TRANT, MAGNY, mademoifelle CHAUSSERY, a dirty abbé BRIGAULT, and Mr. DILLON, are characters very appofite to thefe; and what I fuppofe to have paffed in England is not a whit more ridiculous than what really paffed here.

I SAY nothing of the fhips which the jacobites pretend that they fent into Scotland three weeks or a month after the pretender was returned. I believe they might have had my lord STAIR's connivance then, as well as the regent's. I fay nothing of the order which they pretend to have obtained, and which I never faw, for the ftores that were feifed at Havre to be delivered to CASTEL BLANCO. I have already faid enough on this head, and you cannot have failed to obferve, that this fignal favor was never obtained by thefe people, till the marshal d'HUXELLES had owned to me, that nothing was to be expected from France, and that the only thing which I could do was to endeavor to bring the pretender, the earl of MAR, and the principal perfons who were most exposed, off: neither he nor I imagining that any such would be left behind.

WHEN I began to appear in the world, upon the advertilements which my friends gave me of the clamor that was raifed 5

raifed against me, you will eafily think I did not enter into fo many particulars as I have done with you. I faid even lefs, than you have feen, in those letters which BRINSDEN writ into England, in March and April was twelve month; and yet the clamor funk immediately. The people of confideration at this court beat it down, and the court of St. Germain's grew fo ashamed of it, that the queen thought fit to purge herfelf of having had any fhare in encouraging the difcourfes which were held against me, or having been fo much as let into the fecret of the measure which preceded them. The provocation was great, but I refolved to act without paffion. I faw the advantage the pretender and his council, who disposed of things better for me than I should have done for myfelf, had given me : but I faw likewife, that I must improve this advantage with the utmost caution.

As I never imagined that he would treat me in the manner he did, nor that his ministers could be weak enough to advife him to it; I had refolved, on his return from Scotland, to follow him till his refidence fhould be fixed fomewhere or other : after which, having ferved the tories in this, which I looked upon as their laft ftruggle for power, and having continued to act in the pretender's affairs till the end of the term for which I embarked with him; I should have efteemed myfelf to be at liberty, and fhould in the civileft manner I was able have taken my leave of him. Had we parted thus, I should have remained in a very strange fituation during the reft of my life : but I had examined myfelf thoroughly, I was determined, I was prepared.

On one fide he would have thought that he had a fort of right on any future occasion to call me out of my retreat; the tories would probably have thought the fame thing : my refolu-refolution was taken to refufe them both, and I forefaw, that both would condemn me. On the other fide, the confideration of his keeping meafures with me, joined to that of having once openly declared for him, would have created a point of honor, by which I fhould have been tied down, not only from ever engaging againft him, but alfo from making my peace at home. The CHEVALIER cut this gordian knot afunder at one blow. He broke the links of that chain which former engagements had faftened on me, and gave me a right to efteem myfelf as free from all obligations of keeping meafures with him, as I fhould have continued if I had never engaged in his intereft. I took therefore, from that moment, the refolution of making my peace at home, and of employing all the unfortunate experience I had acquired abroad, to undeceive my friends, and to promote the union and the quiet of my country.

THE earl of STAIR had received a full power to treat with me, whilft I was engaged with the pretender, as I have been fince informed. He had done me the juffice to believe me incapable to hearken, in fuch circumftances, to any propofals of that kind : and as much friendfhip as he had for me, as much as I had for him, we entertained not the leaft even indirect correspondence together during that whole time. Soon afterwards he employed a perfon * to communicate to me the disposition of his majesty to grant me my pardon, and his own defire to give me, on this occasion, all the proofs he could of his inclination in my favor. I embraced the offer, as it became me to do, with all possible fense of the king's goodnefs, and of his lordship's friendship +. We met, we talked together, and he wrote to the court on the fubject. The turn which the minifters gave to this matter was, to enter into a treaty to reverfe my attainder, and to flipulate the conditions on which this act of grace flould be granted me.

THE notion of a treaty flocked me. I refolved never to be reftored rather than go that way to work, and I opened myfelf without any referve to lord STAIR. I told him that I looked on myfelf to be obliged in honor and in confcience to undeceive my friends in England, both as to the flate of foreign affairs, as to the management of the jacobite intereft abroad, and as to the characters of perfons : in every one of which points I knew them to be most groffly and most dangeroufly deluded. That the treatment I had received from the pretender and his adherents would justify me to the world in doing this: that if I remained in exile all my life, he might be affured, that I would never more have to do with the jacobite cause; and that if I was reftored, I should give it an effectual blow, in making that apology which the pretender has put me under a neceffity of making: that in doing this I flattered myfelf, that I should contribute something to the eftablishment of the king's government, and to the union of his fubjects; but that this was all the merit which I could promife to have: that if the court believed thefe professions to be fincere, a treaty with me was unnecessary for them; and that if they did not believe them fo, a treaty with them was dangerous for me : that I was determined in this whole transaction to make no one step which I would not own in the face of the world; that in other circumfances it might be fufficient to act honeftly, but that in a cafe as extraordinary as mine, it was neceffary to act clearly, and to leave no room for the leaft doubtful conftruction.

THE earl of STAIR, as well as Mr. CRAGGS, who arrived foon after in France, came into my fenfe. I have reafon to believe, that the king has approved it likewife upon their reprefentations, fince he has been pleafed to give me the moft gracious affurances of his favor. What the effect of all this may be, in the next, or in any other feffion, I know not : but this is the foot on which I have put myfelf, and on which I ftand at the moment I write to you. The whigs may continue inveterate, and by confequence fruftrate his majefty's good intentions towards me; the tories may continue to rail at me, on the credit of fuch enemies as I have deferibed to you in the courfe of this relation : neither the one nor the other fhall make me fwerve out of the path which I have traced to myfelf.

I HAVE now led you through the feveral ftages which I proposed at first, and I should do wrong to your good understanding as well as to our mutual friendship, if I fuspected that you could hold any other language to me than that which DOLABELLA uses to CICERO. "Satisfac-" tum est jam a te vel officio vel familiaritati ; fatisfac-" tum etiam partibus." The king, who pardons me, might complain of me, the whigs might declaim against me, my family might reproach me for the little regard which I have fhewn to my own and to their interest; but where is the crime I have been guilty of towards my party and towards my friends ? In what part of my conduct will the tories find an excufe for the treatment which they have given me? As tories, fuch as they were when I left England, I defy them to find any. But here lies the fore, and tender as it is, I must lay it open. Those amongst them, who rail at me now, are changed from what they were, or from what they profeffed feffed themfelves to be, when we lived and acted together. They were tories then, they are jacobites now. Their objections to the course of my conduct whilst I was in the pretender's interest are the pretence; the true reason of their anger is, that I renounce the pretender for my life. When you were first driven into this interest, I may appeal to you for the notion which the party had. You thought of re-ftoring him by the strength of the tories, and of opposing a tory king to a whig king. You took him up as the inftrument of your revenge and of your ambition. You looked on him as your creature, and never once doubted of making what terms you pleafed with him. This is fo true, that the fame language is still held to the catechumens in jacobitism. Were the contrary to be avowed even now, the party in England would foon diminish. I engaged on this principle when your orders fent me to Commercy, and I never acted on any other. This ought to have been part of my merit towards the tories, and it would have been fo if they had continued in the fame difpofitions. But they are changed, and this very thing is become my crime. Inftead of making the pretender their tool, they are his. Inftead of having in view to reftore him on their own terms, they are laboring to do it without any terms; that is, to fpeak properly, they are ready to receive him on his. Be not deceived : there is not a man on this fide of the water who acts in any other manner. The church of England-jacobite and the irifh papift feem in every respect to have the fame cause. Those on your fide of the water, who correspond with thefe, are to be comprehended in the fame class: and from hence it is, that the clamor raifed against me has been kept up with fo much industry, and is redoubled on the least appearance of my return home, and of my being in a fituation to juftify myfelf.

You have feen already what reafons the pretender, and the feveral forts of people who compose his party here, had to get rid of me, and to cover me to the utmost of their power with infamy. Their views were as fhort in this cafe as they are in all others. They did not fee at first, that this conduct would not only give me a right, but put me under a neceflity of keeping no farther measures with them, and of laying the whole myftery of their iniquity open. As foon as they difcovered this, they took the only courfe which was left them, that of poifoning the minds of the tories, and of creating fuch prejudices against me whilst I remained in a condition of not speaking for myfelf, as will, they hope, prevent the effect of whatever I may fay when I am in a condition of pleading my own caufe. The bare apprehenfion, that I shall shew the world that I have been guilty of no crime, renders me criminal among thefe men : and they hold themfelves ready, being unable to reply either in point of fact or in point of reason, to drown my voice in the confusion of their clamor.

THE only crimes I am guilty of, I own. I own the crime of having been for the pretender, in a very different manner from those with whom I acted. I ferved him as faithfully, I ferved him as well as they, but I ferved him on a different principle. I own the crime of having renounced him, and of being refolved never to have to do with him as long as I live. I own the crime of being determined fooner or later, as foon as I can, to clear myself of all the unjust afperfions which have been cast upon me; to undeceive by my experience as many as I can of those tories who may have been drawn into error, and to contribute, if ever I return home, as far as I am able, to promote the national good of Britain

Britain without any other regard. These crimes do not, I hope, by this time appear to you to be of a very black dye. You may come, perhaps, to think them virtues, when you have read and confidered what remains to be faid; for before I conclude, it is neceffary that I open one matter to you which I could not weave in fooner without breaking too much the thread of my narration. In this place, unmingled with any thing elfe, it will have, as it deferves to have, your whole attention.

WHOEVER composed that curious piece of false fact, false argument, false english, and false eloquence, the letter from Avignon, fays, that I was not thought the most proper perfon to fpeak about religion. I confess I should be of his mind, and should include his patrons in my cafe, if the practice of it was to be recommended : for furely it is unpardonable impudence to impose by precept what we do not teach by example. I should be of the same mind, if the nature of religion was to be explained, if it's myfteries were to be fathomed, and if this great truth was to be established, that the church of England has the advantage over all other churches in purity of doctrine, and in wifdom of difcipline. But nothing of this kind was neceffary. This would have been the tafk of reverend and learned divines. We of the laity had nothing more to do than to lay in our claim, that we could never fubmit to be governed by a prince who was not of the religion of our country. Such a declaration could hardly have failed of fome effect towards opening the eyes and difposing the mind even of the pretender. At least, in justice to ourselves, and in justice to our party, we who were here ought to have made it, and the influence of it on the pretender ought to have become the rule of our fubsequent conduct.

In

In thinking in this manner I think no otherwife now than I have always thought: and I cannot forget, nor you neither, what paffed when a little before the death of the queen, letters were conveyed from the CHEVALIER to feveral perfons, to myfelf among others. In the letter to me, the article of religion was fo aukwardly handled, that he made the principal motive of the confidence we ought to have in him to confift in his firm refolution to adhere to popery. The effect which this epiftle had on me was the fame which it had on those tories to whom I communicated it at that time; it made us refolve to have nothing to do with him.

.Some time after this I was affured by feveral, and I make no doubt but others have been fo too, that the CHEVALIER at the bottom was not a bigot. That whilft he remained abroad and could expect no fuccor, either prefent or future, from any princes but those of the roman catholic communion, it was prudent, whatever he might think, to make no demonstration of a defign to change : but that his temper was fuch, and he was already fo difposed, that we might depend on his compliance with what fhould be defired of him, if ever he came amongst us, and was taken from under the wing of the queen his mother. To ftrengthen this opinion of his character, it was faid that he had fent for Mr. LES-LEY over; that he allowed him to celebrate the church of England-fervice in his family, and that he had promifed to hear what this divine fhould represent on the fubject of religion to him. When I came abroad, the fame things, and much more, were at first infinuated to me, and I began to let them make impression upon me, notwithstanding what I had feen under his hand. I would willingly flatter myfelf, that this impreffion disposed me to incline to jacobitism, rather than allow that the inclination to jacobitifm difpofed me me eafily to believe what, upon that principle, I had fo much reafon to wifh might be true. Which was the caufe, and which the effect, I cannot well determine : perhaps they did mutually occafion each other. Thus much is certain, that I was far from weighing this matter as I ought to have done, when the folicitation of my friends and the perfecution of my enemies precipitated me into engagements with the pretender.

I was willing to take it for granted, that fince you were as ready to declare, as I believed you at that time, you muft take had entire fatisfaction on the article of religion. I was foor undeceived; this ftring had never been touched. My own obfervation, and the unanimous report of all those who from his infancy have approached the pretender's perfon, foon taught me how difficult it is to come to terms with him on this head, and how unfafe to embark without them.

His religion is not founded on the love of virtue and the deteftation of vice; on a fenfe of that obedience which is due to the will of the Supreme Being; and a fenfe of thofe obligations which creatures formed to live in a mutual dependence on one another lie under. The fpring of his whole conduct is fear. Fear of the horns of the devil, and of the flames of hell. He has been taught to believe, that nothing but a blind fubmiffion to the church of Rome, and a ftrict adherence to all the terms of that communion, can fave him from thefe dangers. He has all the fuperflition of a capuchin; but I found on him no tincture of the religion of a prince. Do not imagine that I loofe the reins to my imagination, or that I write what my refertments dictate : I tell you fimply my opinion. I have heard the fame defcription of his character made by thofe who know him beft; and I converfed with very few among the roman catholics themfelves, who did not think him too much a papift.

NOTHING gave me from the beginning fo much uneafinefs as the confideration of this part of his character, and of the little care which had been taken to correct it. A true turn had not been given to the first steps which were made with him. The tories, who engaged afterwards, threw themfelves as it were at his head. He had been fuffered to think that the party in England wanted him as much as he wanted them. There was no room to hope for much compliance on the head of religion, when he was in these sentiments, and when he thought the tories too far advanced to have it in their power to retreat : and little dependence was at any time to be placed on the promifes of a man capable of thinking his damnation attached to the obfervance, and his falvation to the breach of these very promises. Something, however, was to be done : and I thought that the leaft which could be done was, to deal plainly with him, and to fhew him the impoffibility of governing our nation by any other expedient, than by complying with that which would be expected from him as to his religion. This was thought too much by the duke of ORMOND and Mr. LESLEY; altho the duke could be no more ignorant than the minister, how ill the latter had been used, how far the CHEVALIER had been from keeping the word which he had given, and on the faith of which Mr. LESLEY had come over to him. They both knew, that he not only refused to hear himfelf, but that he sheltered the ignorance of his priests, or the badness of his caufe, or both, behind his authority, and abfolutely forbid all discourse concerning religion. The duke seemed convinced that it would be time enough to talk of religion to him when he fhould be reftored, or, at fooneft, when he fhould be landed in England; that the influence under which he had had lived being at a diffance, the reafonablenefs of what we might propofe, joined to the apparent neceffity which would then ftare him in the face, could not fail to produce all the effects which we could defire.

To me this whole reafoning appeared fallacious. Our bufinefs was not to make him change appearances on this fide of the water, but to prepare him to give those which would be neceffary on the other : and there was no room to hope that if we could gain nothing on his prejudices here, we fhould be able to overcome them in Britain. I would have argued just as the duke of ORMOND and LESLEY, if I had been a papift; and I faw well enough that fome people about him, for in a great dearth of ability there was cunning to be met with, affected nothing more than to keep off all discourse of religion. To my apprehension it was exceeding plain that we fhould find, if we were once in England, the neceffity of going forward at any rate with him, much greater than he would find that of complying with us. I thought it an unpardonable fault to have taken a formal engagement with him, when no previous fatisfaction had been obtained on a point, at least as effential to our civil as to our religious rights; to the peace of the ftate, as to the prosperity of the church : and I looked on this fault to be aggravated by every day's delay. Our filence was unfair, both to the CHEVALIER, and to our friends in England. He was induced by it to believe, that they would exact far lefs from him, than we knew they expected : and they were confirmed in an opinion of his docility, which we knew to be void of all foundation. The pretence of removing that influence, under which he had lived, was frivolous, and fhould never have been urged to me, who faw plainly, that according to the measures purfued by the very perfons who urged it, he must be environed in England by the same people people that furrounded him here; and that the court of St. James's would be conflituted, if ever he was reftored, in the fame manner as that of St. Germain's was.

WHEN the draught of a declaration, and other papers which were to be difperfed in Great Britain, came to be fettled, it appeared that my apprehension and distrust were but too well founded. The pretender took exception against feveral passages, and particularly against those, wherein a direct promise of fecuring the churches of England and Ireland was made. He was told, he faid, that he could not in confcience make fuch a promife : and, the debate being kept up a little while, he afked me with fome warmth, why the tories were fo defirous to have him, if they expected those things from him which his religion did not allow? I left these draughts by his order with him, that he might confider and amend them. I cannot fay that he fent them to the queen to be corrected by her confessor and the rest of her council; but I firmly believe it. Sure I am, that he took time sufficient to do this; before he fent them from Bar where he then was, to Paris whither I was returned. When they were digested in such a manner as satisfied his casuists, he made them be printed : and my name was put to the declaration, as if the original had been figned by me. I had hitherto submitted my opinion to the judgment of others; but on this occafion I took advice from myfelf. I declared to him, that I would not fuffer my name to be at the bottom of this paper. All the copies which came to my hands I burnt, and another was printed off, without any counterfigning. יים שחיצע או ונהרכוויין לוינו

THE whole tenor of the amendments was one continued inftance of the groffeft bigotry; and the most material paffages were turned with all the jesuitical prevarication imaginable. As much as it was his interest, at that time, to culcultivate the refpect which many of the tories really had for the memory of the late queen, and which many others affected as a farther mark of their opposition to the court, and to the whig party; as much as it was his intereft to weave the honor of her name into his caufe, and to render her, even after her death, a party to the dispute; he could not be prevailed upon to give her that character which her enemies allowed her, nor to make use of those expressions in speaking of her, which by the general manner of their application, are come to be little more than terms of respect and words of form, proper in the ftyle of public acts. For inftance :

SHE was called in the original draught " his fifter of glo-" rious and bleffed memory." In that which he publifhed, the epithet of " bleffed" was left out. Her eminent juftice and her exemplary piety, were occasionally mentioned. In lieu of which, he fubfituted a flat, and in this cafe an invidious expression, " her inclinations to juftice."

the it of the training of the

Nor content with declaring her neither just nor pious in this world, he did little lefs than declare her damned in the other, according to the charitable principles of the church of Rome.

"When it pleafed almighty God to take her to himfelf," was the expression used in speaking of the death of the queen. This he erafed, and instead thereof inferted these words: "when it pleafed almighty God to put a period to her life."

HE gracioufly allowed the universities to be nurferies of loyalty, but did not think that it became him to ftyle them "nurferies of religion."

SINCE his father paffes already for a faint, and fince reports are encouraged of miracles, which they suppose to be suppose wrought.

wrought at his tomb, he might have allowed his grandfather to pais for a martyr: but he ftruck out of the draught thefe words, "that bleffed martyr who died for his people," which were applied to king CHARLES the first, and would fay nothing more of him than that "he fell a facrifice to rebellion."

In the claufe which related to the churches of England and Ireland, there was a plain and direct promife inferted of "effectual provision for their fecurity; and for their re-ef-"tablifhment in all those rights which belong to them." This claufe was not fuffered to ftand, but another was formed, wherein all mention of the church of Ireland was omitted, and nothing was promifed to the church of England but the fecurity, " and re-eftablifhment of all those rights, "privileges, immunities, and possifions which belong to " her," and wherein he had already promifed by his declaration of the twentieth of July, to fecure and " protect all " her members."

I NEED make no comment on a proceeding to eafy to be underflood. The drift of these evaluons, and of this affected obscurity is obvious enough, at least it will appear to by the observations which remain to be made.

HE was fo afraid of admitting any words which might be conftrued into a promife of his confenting to those things, which should be found necessary for the present or future fecurity of our conftitution, that in a paragraph where he was made to fay, that he thought himself obliged to be follicitous for the prosperity of the church of England, the word prosperity was expunged; and we were left by this mental refervation to guess what he was follicitous for ? It could not be for her prosperity, that he had expunged. It must therefore be for her deftruction, which in his language would have been styled, her conversion.

SIR WILLIAM WINDHAM. [97]

ANOTHER remarkable proof of the fame kind is to be found towards the conclusion of the declaration. After having fpoke of the peace and florishing effate of the kingdom, he was made to express his readiness to concert with the two houses fuch further measures, as should be thought neceffary for fecuring the fame to future generations. The defign of this paragraph you fee. He and his council faw it too, and therefore the word "fecuring" was laid aside, and the word "leaving" was inferted in lieu of it.

ONE would imagine, that a declaration corrected in this manner might have been fuffered to go abroad without any. farther precaution. But these papers had been penned by protestants, and who could answer that there might not be still ground fufficient from the tenor of them to infift on every thing neceffary for the fecurity of that religion? The declaration of the twentieth of July had been penned by a prieft of the footch college, and the expressions had been measured to as to fuit perfectly with the conduct which the chevalier intended to hold, fo as to leave room to diffinguish him, upon future occasions, with the help of a little pious fophiftry, out of all the engagements which he feemed to take in it. This orthodox paper was therefore to accompany the heretical paper into the world, and no promife of moment was to ftand in the latter, unless qualified by a reference to the former. Thus the church was to be fecured in the rights &c. which belong to her. How? No otherwife than according to the declaration of the month of July. And what does that promife? Security and protection to the members of this church in the enjoyment of their property. I make no doubt, but BELLARMINE, if he had been the chevalier's confessor, would have passed this paragraph thus amended. No engagement whatever taken in favor of the VOL. I. N church church of Ireland, and a happy diftinction found between fecuring that of England, and protecting her members. Many a ufeful project for the deftruction of heretics, and for accumulating power and riches to the fee of Rome, has been eftablished on a more flender foundation.

THE fame fpirit reigns through the whole. Civil and religious rights are no otherwife to be confirmed, than in conformity to the declaration of July; nay the general pardon is reftrained and limited to the terms preferibed therein.

THIS is the account which I judged too important to be omitted, and which I chofe to give you all together. I shall furely be justified at prefent in concluding, that the tories are groffly deluded in their opinion of this prince's character, or elfe that they facrifice all which ought to be efteemed precious and facred among men, to their passions. In both these cafes I remain still a tory, and am true to the party. In the first I endeavor to undeceive you by an experience purchafed at my expence and for your fakes : in the fecond I endeavor to prevail on you to revert to that principle from which we have deviated. You never intended, whilft I lived amongft you, the ruin of your country; and yet every ftep, which you now make towards the reftoration you are fo fond of, is a ftep towards this ruin. No man of fense, well informed, can ever go into measures for it, unless he thinks himfelf and his country in fuch desperate circumstances, that nothing is left them but to chufe of two ruins that which they like beft.

THE exile of the royal family, under CROMWFLL'S ufurpation, was the principal caufe of all those misfortunes, in which Britain has been involved, as well as of many of those which have happened to the rest of Europe, during more than half a century.

SIR WILLIAM WINDHAM. [99]

THE two brothers, CHARLES and JAMES, became then infected with popery to fuch degrees, as their different characters admitted of. CHARLES had parts, and his good understanding ferved as an antidote to repel the poifon. JAMES, the fimplest man of his time, drank off the whole chalice. The poifon met, in his composition, with all the fear, all the credulity, and all the obstinacy of temper proper to increafe it's virulence, and to strengthen it's effect. The first had always a wrong byafs upon him ; he connived at the eftablishment, and indirectly contributed to the growth of that power, which afterwards diffurbed the peace, and threatened the liberty of Europe fo often : but he went no farther out of the way. The opposition of his parliaments, and his own reflections flopped him here. The prince and the people were indeed mutually jealous of one another, from whence much prefent diforder flowed, and the foundation of future evils was laid : but his good and his bad principles combating still together, he maintained, during a reign of more than twenty years, in fome tolerable degree, the authority of the crown, and the florishing effate of the nation. The laft, drunk with fuperstitious and even enthufiaftic zeal, ran headlong into his own ruin, whilft he endeavored to precipitate ours. His parliament and his people did all they could to fave themfelves by winning him. But all was vain : he had no principle on which they could take hold. Even his good qualities worked against them, and his love of his country went halves with his bigotry. How he fucceeded we have heard from our fathers. The revolution of one thousand fix hundred and eighty-eight faved the nation, and ruined the king.

Now the pretender's education has rendered him infinitely lefs fit than his uncle, and at least as unfit as his father, to be king of Great Britain. Add to this, that there is no refource in his understanding. Men of the best sense find it hard hard to overcome religious prejudices, which are of all the ftrongeft; but he is a flave to the weakeft. The rod hangs like the fword of DAMOCLES over his head, and he trembles before his mother and his prieft. What, in the name of God, can any member of the church of England promife himfelf from fuch a character? Are we by another revolution to return into the fame flate from which we were delivered by the first? Let us take example from the roman catholics, who act very reafonably in refufing to fubmit to a protestant prince. HENRY the fourth had at least as good a title to the crown of France as the pretender has to ours. His religion alone flood in his way, and he had never been king if he had not removed that obftacle. Shall we fubmit to a popifh prince, who will no more imitate HENRY the fourth in changing his religion, than he will imitate those fhining qualities which rendered him the honefteft gentleman, the bravest captain, and the greatest prince of his age? Allow me to give a loofe to my pen for a moment on this subject. General benevolence, and universal charity feem to be eftablished in the gospel as the distinguishing badges of christianity. 'How it happens I cannot tell; but so it is, that in all ages of the church the professions of christianity feem to have been animated by a quite contrary fpirit. Whilft they were thinly fcattered over the world, tolerated in some places, but established no where, their zeal often confumed their charity. Paganifm, at that time the religion by law established, was infulted by many of them; the ceremonies were difturbed, the altars thrown down. As foon as by the favor of CONSTANTINE their numbers were increafed, and the reins of government were put into their hands, they began to imploy the fecular arm, not only against different religions, but against different fects which arofe in their own religion. A man may boldly affirm that more blood has been shed in 'the disputes between christian and chriftian.

chriftian, than has ever been drawn from the whole body of them in the perfecutions of the heathen emperors, and in the conquests of the mahometan princes. From these they have received quarter, but never from one another. The chriftian religion is actually tolerated among the mahometans, and the domes of churches and mofques arife in the fame city. But it will be hard to find an example, where one fect of christians has tolerated another which it was in their power to extirpate. They have gone farther in thefe. later ages: what was practifed formerly has been taught fince. Perfecution has been reduced into fystem, and the disciples of the meek and humble JESUS have avowed a tyranny, which the most barbarous conquerors never claimed. The wicked fubtilty of cafuifts has eftablished breach of faith with those who differ from us, as a duty in opposition to faith, and murder itfelf has been made one of the means of falvation. I know very well that the reformed churches have been far from going those cruel lengths, which are authorifed by the doctrine as well as example of that of Rome; tho CALVIN put a flåming fword on the title of a french edition of his inflitute, with this motto, " Je ne suis point ve-" nu mettre la paix, mais l'epée :" but I know likewise, that the difference lies in the means, and not in the aim of their policy. The church of England, the most humane of all of them, would root out every other religion, if it was in her power. She would not hang and burn ; her measures would be milder, and therefore, perhaps, more effectual.

SINCE then there is this inveterate rancor among christians, can any thing be more abfurd, than for those of one perfuation to trust the fupreme power, or any part of it, to those of another? Particularly, must it not be reputed madness in those of our religion, to trust themselves in the hands of roman catholics? Must it not be reputed impudence in a roman roman catholic to expect that we fhould? he who looks upon us as heretics, as men in rebellion against a lawful, nay a divine authority, and whom it is therefore meritorious by all forts of ways to reduce to obedience. There are many, I know, amongst them who think more generously, and whose morals are not corrupted by that which is called religion: but this is the spirit of the priesthood, in whose scale that forap of a parable, "Compel them to come in," which they apply as they please, outweighs the whole decalogue. This will be the spirit of every man who is bigot enough to be under their direction: and so much is fufficient for my prefent purpose.

DURING your laft feffion of parliament, it was expected that the whigs would attempt to repeal the occasional bill. The fame jealoufy continues; there is, perhaps, foundation for it. Give me leave to afk you, upon what principle we argued for making this law, and upon what principle you must argue against the repeal of it. I have mentioned the principle in the beginning of this difcourfe. No man ought to be trufted with any fhare of power under a government, who must, to act confistently with himself, endeavor the de-Aruction of that very government. Shall this proposition pass for true, when it is applied to keep a presbyterian from being mayor of a corporation? and shall it become false, when it is applied to keep a papift from being king? The proposition is equally true in both cafes, but the argument drawn from it is just fo much stronger in the latter, than in the former cafe, as the mischiefs, which may refult from the power and influence of a king, are greater than those which can be wrought by a magistrate of the lowest order. This feems to my apprehension to be argumentum ad hominem, and I do not fee by what happy diffinction a jacobite tory could elude the force of it.

IT may be faid, and it has been urged to me, that if the chevalier was reftored, the knowledge of his character would be our fecurity ; " habet foenum in cornu :" there would be no pretence for trufting him, and by confequence it would be easy to put such restrictions on the exercise of the regal power, as might hinder him from invading or fapping our religion and liberty. But this I utterly deny. Experience has fhewn us how ready men are to court power and profit; and who can determine, how far either the tories or the whigs would comply, in order to fecure to themfelves the enjoyment of all the places in the kingdom ? Suppose however, that a majority of true Ifraelites should be found, whom no temptation could oblige to bow the knee to BAAL; in order to preferve the government on one hand, muft they not deftroy it on the other ? The neceffary reftrictions would in this cafe be fo many, and fo important, as to leave hardly the shadow of a monarchy, if he fubmitted to them; and if he did not fubmit to them, these patriots would have no resource left but in rebellion. Thus, therefore, the affair would turn, if the pretender was reftored. We might, most probably, lose our religion and liberty by the bigotry of the prince, and the corruption of the people. We should have no chance of preferving them, but by an entire change of the whole frame of our government, or by another revolution. What reafonable man would voluntarily reduce himfelf to the neceffity. of making an option among fuch melancholy alternatives?

THE beft which could be hoped for, were the chevalier on the throne, would be, that a thread of favorable accidents, improved by the wifdom and virtue of parliament, might keep off the evil day during his reign. But ftill the fatal caufe would be eftablifhed, it would be entailed upon us, and every man would be apprifed, that fooner or later the fatal effect muft follow. Confider a little what a condition we fhould be in, both with refpect fpect to our foreign intereft, and our domeftic quiet, whilft the reprieve lafted, whilft the chevalier or his fucceffors made, no direct attack upon the conftitution.

As to the first, it is true indeed, that princes and states are friends or foes to one another, according as the motives of ambition drive them. These are the first principles of union and division amongst them. The protestant powers of Europe, have joined, in our days, to fupport and aggrandife the house of Austria, as they did, in the days of our forefathers, to defeat her defigns, and to reduce her power ; and the most christian king of France has more than once joined his councils, and his arms too, with the councils and arms of the most mahometan emperor of Constantinople. But still there is, and there must continue, as long as the influence of the papal authority fubfifts in Europe, another general, permanent, and invariable division of interests. The powers of earth, like those of heaven, have two diffinct motions. Each of them rolls in his own political orb, but each of them is hurried at the fame time round the great vortex of his religion. If this general notion be just, apply it to the prefent cafe. Whilft a roman catholic holds the rudder, how can we expect to be fleered in our proper courfe? His political intereft will certainly incline him to direct our first motion right; but his mistaken religious interest will render him incapable of doing it fteadily.

As to the laft, our domeftic quiet; even whilft the chevalier, and those of his race concealed their game, we should remain in the most unhappy state which human nature is subject to, a state of doubt and suspence. Our prefervation would depend on making him the object of our eternal jealoufy, who, to render himself and his people happy, ought to be that of our intire confidence.

WHILST the pretender and his fucceffors forbore to attack the religion and liberty of the nation, we fhould remain in the condition of those people who labor under a broken conflitution, or who carry about them fome chronical distemper. They feel a little pain at every moment; or a certain uneafines, which is fometimes less tolerable than pain, hangs continually on them, and they languish in the constant expectation of dying perhaps in the feverest torture.

But if the fear of hell fhould diffipate all other fears in the pretender's mind, and carry him, which is frequently the effect of that paffion, to the moft defperate undertakings; if among his fucceffors a man bold enough to make the attempt fhould arife, the condition of the britifh nation would be ftill more deplorable. The attempt fucceeding, we fhould fall into tyranny; for a change of religion could never be brought about by confent; and the fame force, that would be fufficient to enflave our confciences, would be fufficient for all the other purpofes of arbitrary power. The attempt failing, we fhould fall into anarchy; for there is no medium when difputes between a prince and his people are arrived at a certain point; he muft either be fubmitted to, or depofed.

I HAVE now laid before you even more than I intended to have faid when I took my pen; and I am perfuaded, that if thefe papers ever come to your hands, they will enable you to caft up the account between party and me. Till the time of the queen's death it flands, I believe, even between us. The tories diffinguifhed me by their approbation, and by the credit which I had amongft them; and I endeavored to diffinguifh myfelf in their fervice, under the immediate weight of great difcouragement, and with the no very diffant profpect of great danger. Since that time the account is not fo even, and I dare appeal to any impartial perfon, whether Vol. I. [O] my Secret Letter *.

Monfieur,

VOus avés vu par ma depêche l'état de la negotiation. J'ai à prefent à vous parler, en particulier, de Boling-BROKE.

JE l'ai vu chés moi le jour après l'arrivée de Mr. PITT: et nous avons eu enfemble une conversation d'une heure et demie; dont la substance est, que lui, BOLINGBROKE, renttroit, du meilleur de son cœur, dans son devoir envers son roi et sa patrie; et que rien au monde étoit capable de le détacher de cette resolution, quand même sa majesté ne trouveroit pas à propos de lui faire grace. Qu'il étoit prêt,

* This letter, which, with feveral more private and fecret letters, had been returned to lord STAIR by his correspondent, was communicated to the editor of these papers, fome time ago, by a relation of his lordship: and it is copied here, exactly, from the original in his own hand-writing. de ce moment, à s'employer avec moi dans ce païs-ici pour le fervice du roi, fi je croyois qu'il y pouvoit être utile à quelque chofe; et qu'il me communiqueroit tout ce qui viendroit à fa connoiffance qui me pourroit être de quelque ufage, et qu'il m'aideroit volontiers de toutes les lumiercs qu'il pourroit avoir acquifes par fes habitudes ici.

IL me dit, que je sçavois bien, par son caractere, qu'il ne faifoit pas les choses à demi; qu'en rentrant en son devoir il se proposoit de servir le roi et sa patrie avec zèle et avec affection. Que pour cet effet, il se croiroit obligé, par toutes les obligations du devoir, de la reconnoissance, de l'honneur et de l'interêt même, d'informer le roi de tout ce que son experience lui pourroit suggérer d'utile pour le service de sa majesté, pour l'affermissement de la tranquillité publique, et pour prévenir tous les projets qui se pourront former en faveur de ses ennemis. Qu'il feroit tout ce qui dependroit de lui de faire reptrer les toris qui ont embrassé le parti du prétendant dans leur devoir, en leur faisant voir quelle espece d'homme le prétendant étoit ; et qu'ils se trompoient s'ils croyoient qu'ils pourroient avoir de la feureté avec lui ou pour leur liberté ou pour leur réligion. Que pour pouvoir faire cela, il étoit neceffaire, même pour le fervice du roi; que lui, Bolingbroke, ne fût pas perdu de reputation, qu'il. ne passât pas pour délateur.

IL infifta beaucoup fur cet article. " Ce que je propofe " de faire, me dit-il, eft digne d'un honnête homme, con-" vaincu de fon erreur et touché d'un vrai répentir ; c'eft ce. ## [108] THE EARL OF STAIR &c.

JE ne dois pas oublier à vous dire, qu'outre fon éloignement pour le prétendant, il m'a temoigné beaucoup de dépit contre la France : et je fuis fûr qu'il me parloit fincerement.

JE ferai bien-aife d'être inftruit au plutôt touchant les intentions du roi à fon égard, et de ce que je dois lui promettre au nom de fa majesté; afin qu'il puisse être en état de se rétirer de ce païs-ici, où j'appréhende qu'il ne fait pas bon pour lui.

Pour moi; je vous avoue franchement, que je crois qu'il m'a parlé dans la fincérité de fon cœur; qu'il est resolu de faire son mieux pour abattre le parti du prétendant, et pour le déraciner tout-à-fait si cela dependoit de lui : et il me paroit certain, qu'il n'y a personne qui puisse nuire au prétendant au point qu'il le peut faire.

A'LA fin de nôtre converfation, il me ferra la main, et me dit : " Mi lord, fi l'on me fait la juftice de croire que mes " profeffions font finceres, plus ils menagent ma réputa-" tion, plus ils font le fervice du roi. Si au contraire ils " me foupçonnent de ne pas marcher droit, ils auront raifon " d'exiger de moi des conditions que j'aurai en même tems " raifon, comme un honnête homme, de réfufer. Les diffi-" cultés que je fais de promettre trop, peuvent fervir de ga-" rans que je tiendrai ce à quoi je m'engage. ISSIPATION of mind, and length of time, are the remedies to which the greatest part of mankind trust in their afflictions. But the first of these works a temporary, the fecond a flow, effect : and both are unworthy of a wife man. Are we to fly from ourfelves that we may fly from our misfortunes, and fondly to imagine that the difeafe is cured becaufe we find means to get fome moments of refpite from pain? Or shall we expect from time, the phyfician of brutes, a lingering and uncertain deliverance? Shall we wait to be happy till we can forget that we are miferable, and owe to the weakness of our faculties a tranquillity which ought to be the effect of their ftrength? Far otherwife. Let us fet all our past and our present afflictions at once before our eyes +. Let us refolve to overcome them, instead of flying from them, or wearing out the fenfe of them by long and ignominious patience. Inftead of palliating remedies, let us

THE recalling of former misfortunes ferves to fortify the mind against later. He must blush to fink under the anguish of one wound, who furveys a body feamed over with the fcars of many, and who has come victorious out of all the conflicts wherein he received them. Let fighs, and tears, and fainting under the lightest ftrokes of adverse fortune, be the portion of those unhappy people whose tender minds a long course of felicity has enervated : while fuch, as have passed through years of calamity, bear up, with a noble and immoveable constancy, against the heaviest. Uninterrupted misery has this good effect, as it continually torments, it finally hardens.

SUCH is the language of philosophy: and happy is the man who acquires the right of holding it. ' But this right is not to be acquired by pathetic difcourfe. Our conduct can alone give it us: and therefore, instead of prefuming on our ftrength, the fureft method is to confess our weakness, and, without lofs of time, to apply ourfelves to the fludy of wifdom. This was the advice which the oracle gave to ZENO*, and there is no other way of fecuring our tranquillity amidst all the accidents to which human life is exposed. Philofophy has, I know, her THRASOS, as well as War: and among her fons many there have been, who, while they aimed at being more than men, became fomething lefs. The means of preventing this danger are easy and fure. It is a good rule, to examine well before we addict ourfelves to any fect : but I think it is a better rule, to addict ourfelves to none. Let us hear them all, with a perfect indifferency on which fide the truth lies : and, when we come to determine, let nothing appear fo venerable to us as our own underftandings. Let us gratefully accept the help of every one who has endeavoured to correct the vices, and ftrengthen the minds of men; but let us chufe for ourfelves, and yield univerfal affent to none. Thus, that I may inftance the fect already mentioned, when we have laid afide the wonderful and furprifing fentences, and all the paradoxes of the Portique, we fhall find in that fchool fuch doctrines as our unprejudiced reafon fubmits to with pleafure, as nature dictates, and as experience confirms. Without this precaution, we run the rifque of becoming imaginary kings, and real flaves. With it, we may learn to affert our native freedom, and live independent on fortune.

In order to which great end, it is neceffary that we ftand watchful, as centinels, to difcover the fecret wiles and open attacks of this capricious goddels, before they reach us *. Where she falls upon us unexpected, it is hard to refift; but those who wait for her, will repel her with ease. The fudden invalion of an enemy overthrows fuch as are not on their guard; but they who forefee the war, and prepare themfelves for it before it breaks out, fland, without difficulty, the first and the fiercest onset. I learned this important lesion long ago, and never trufted to fortune even while fhe feemed to be at peace with me. The riches, the honors, the reputation, and all the advantages which her treacherous indulgence poured upon me, I placed fo, that fhe might fnatch them away without giving me any difturbance. I kept a great interval between me and them. She took them, but she could not tear them from me. No man fuffers by bad fortune, but he who has been deceived by good. If we grow fond of her gifts, fancy that they belong to us, and are perpetually to remain with us, if we lean upon them, and expect to be confidered for them; we fhall fink into all the bitternefs of grief, as foon as thefe falfe and transitory benefits pass away, as foon as our vain and childish minds, unfraught with folid pleafures, become defitute even of those which are imaginary. But, if we do not fuffer ourfelves to be transported by prosperity, neither shall we be reduced by adverfity. Our fouls will be of proof against the dangers of both these states : and, having explored our strength, we shall be fure of it; for in the midst of felicity, we shall have tried how we can bear misfortune.

IT is much harder to examine and judge, than to take up opinions on truft; and therefore the far greatest part of the world borrow, from others, those which they entertain concerning all the affairs of life and death *. Hence it proceeds that men are fo unanimoufly eager in the purfuit of things, which, far from having any inherent real good, are varnished over with a specious and deceitful gloss, and contain nothing answerable to their appearances+. Hence it proceeds, on the other hand, that, in those things which are called evils, there is nothing fo hard and terrible as the general cry of the world threatens. The word exile comes indeed harfh to the ear, and strikes us like a melancholy and execrable found, through a certain perfuafion which men have habitually concurred in. Thus the multitude has ordained. But the greatest part of their ordinances are abrogated by the wife.

REJECTING therefore the judgment of those who determine according to popular opinions, or the first appearances of things, let us examine what exile really is‡. It is, then, a change of place; and, left you fhould fay that I diminifh the object, and conceal the moft fhocking parts of it, I add, that this change of place is frequently accompanied by fome or all of the following inconveniences: by the lofs of the eftate which we enjoyed, and the rank which we held; by the lofs of that confideration and power which we were in pofferfion of; by a feparation from our family and our friends; by the contempt which we may fall into; by the ignominy with which those who have driven us abroad, will endeavour to fully the innocence of our characters, and to juftify the injuffice of their own conduct.

ALL thefe shall be spoke to hereafter. In the mean while, let us confider what evil there is, in change of place, abstractedly and by itself.

To live deprived of one's country is intolerable *. Is it fo? How comes it then to pass that fuch numbers of men live out of their countries by choice? Observe how the streets of London and of Paris are crowded. Call over those millions by name, and ask them one by one, of what country they are : how many will you find, who, from different parts of the earth, come to inhabit these great cities, which afford the largest opportunities, and the largest encouragement, to virtue and to vice? Some are drawn by ambition, and some are fent by duty; many refort thither to improve their minds, and many to improve their fortunes; others bring their beauty, and others their eloquence, to market. Remove from hence, and go to the utmost extremities of the East or the West: visit the barbarous nations of Africa, or the inhospitable regions of the. age, as not to have fome people who come from abroad, and inhabit there by choice.

AMONG numberless extravagancies which have paffed through the minds of men, we may juftly reckon for one that notion of a fecret affection, independent of our reafon, and fuperior to our reafon, which we are fuppofed to have for our country; as if there were fome phyfical virtue in every fpot of ground, which necefiarily produced this effect in every one born upon it.

at at Stall La foot to have a for the to he was a As if the heimvei was an universal distemper, inseparable from the conftitution of an human body, and not peculiar to the Swifs, who feem to have been made for their mountains, as their mountains feem to have been made for them +. This notion may have contributed to the fecurity and grandeur of states. It has therefore been not unartfully cultivated, and the prejudice of education has been with care put on its fide. Men have come in this cafe, as in many, from believing that it ought to be fo, to perfuade others, and even to believe themselves that it is fo. PROCOPIUS relates. that ABGARUS came to Rome, and gained the effeem and friendship of Augustus to such a degree, that this emperor could not refolve to let him return home : that ABGARUS. brought feveral beafts, which he had taken one day in hunting, alive to Augustus: that he placed in different parts of the Circus fome of the earth which belonged to the places where each of these animals had been caught; that as foon as this was done, and they were turned loofe, every one of them ran to that corner where his earth lay: that. AUGUSTUS, admiring their fentiment of love for their country which nature has graved in the hearts of beafts, and ftruck by the evidence of the truth, granted the request which ABGARUS immediately preffed upon him, and allowed, though with regret, the tetrarch to return to Edeffa. But this tale deferves just as much credit as that which follows in the fame place, of the letter of ABGARUS to JESUS CHRIST, of our Saviour's answer, and of the cure of ABGARUS. There is nothing, furely, more groundlefs than the notion here advanced, nothing more abfurd. We love the country in which we are born, becaufe we receive particular benefits from it, and becaufe we have particular obligations to it : which ties we may have to another country, as well as to that we are born in; to our country by election, as well as to our country by birth. In all other respects, a wife man looks on himfelf as a citizen of the world : and, when you ask him where his country lies, points, like ANAXAGORAS, with his finger to the heavens.

THERE are other perfons, again, who have imagined that as the whole univerfe fuffers a continual rotation, and nature feems to delight in it, or to preferve herfelf by it, fo there is in the minds of men, a natural reftlefinefs, which inclines them to change of place, and to the fhifting their habitations*. This opinion has at leaft an appearance of truth, which the other wants; and is countenanced, as the other is contradicted, by experience. But, whatever the reafons be, which muft have varied infinitely in an infinite number of cafes, and an immenfe fpace of time; true it is in fact, that the families and nations of the world have been in a continual fluctuation, roaming about on the face of the globe, driving and driven out by turns. What a number of colonies has Afia fent into Europe ! The Phoenicians planted the coafts of the Mediterranean fea, and pufhed their

fettlements even into the ocean. The Etrurians were of Afiatic extraction; and, to mention no more, the Romans, those lords of the world, acknowledged a Trojan exile for the founder of their empire. How many migrations have there been, in return to thefe, from Europe into Afia? They would be endless to enumerate ; for, besides the Aeolic, the Ionic, and others of almost equal fame, the Greeks, during feveral ages, made continual expeditions, and built cities in feveral parts of Afia. The Gauls penetrated thither too, and eftablished a kingdom. The European Scythians overran these vast provinces, and carried their arms to the confines of Egypt. ALEXANDER fubdued all from the Hellefpont to India, and built towns, and eftablished colonies, to fecure his conquests, and to eternize his name. From both these parts of the world Africa has received inhabitants and mafters; and what she has received she has given. The Tyrians built the city, and founded the republic, of Carthage; and Greek has been the language of Egypt. In the remotest antiquity we hear of BELUS in Chaldaea, and of SESOSTRIS planting his tawny colonies in Colchos: and Spain. has been, in these latter ages, under the dominion of the Moors. If we turn to Runic history, we find our fathers, the Goths, led by WODEN and by THOR, their heroes first and their divinities afterwards, from the Afiatic. Tartary into Europe: and who can affure us that this was their first migration? They came into Afia perhaps by the eaft, from that continent to which their fons have lately failed from Europe by the weft : and thus, in the process of three or four thousand years, the same race of men have pushed their conquests and their habitations round the globe : at least this may be fupposed, as reasonably as it is supposed, I think: by GROTIUS, that America was peopled from Scandinavia. The world is a great wildernefs, wherein mankind have wandered and joffled one another about from the creation. Some

Some have removed by neceffity, and others by choice. One nation has been fond of feizing what another was tired of poffeffing : and it will be difficult to point out the country which is to this day in the hands of its first inhabitants.

Thus fate has ordained that nothing shall remain long in the fame ftate: and what are all thefe transportations of people, but fo many public exiles? VARRO, the most learned of the Romans, thought, fince Nature * is the fame whereever we go, that this fingle circumstance was fufficient to remove all objections to change of place, taken by itfelf, and ftripped of the other inconveniences which attend exile. M. BRUTUS thought it enough that those who go into banishment, cannot be hindered from carrying their virtue along with them. Now, if any one judge that each of these comforts is in itself insufficient, he must however confess that both of them, joined together, are able to remove the terrors of exile. For what trifles must all we leave behind us be efteemed, in comparison of the two most precious things which men can enjoy, and which, we are fure, will follow us wherever we turn our steps, the fame nature, and our proper virtue +? Believe me, the providence of GoD has eftablished fuch an order in the world, that of all which belongs to us the leaft valuable parts can alone fall under the will of others. Whatever is beft is fafeft; lies out of the reach of human power; can neither be given nor taken away. Such is this great and beautiful work of nature, the world. Such is the mind of man, which contemplates and admires the world whereof it makes the nobleft part. Thefe are infeparably ours, and as long as we remain in one we fhall enjoy the other. Let us march therefore intrepidly wherever we are led by the course of human accidents.

Wherever

Wherever they lead us, on what coaft foever we are thrown by them, we shall not find ourfelves absolutely strangers. We shall meet with men and women, creatures of the fame figure, endowed with the fame faculties, and born under the fame laws of nature. We shall fee the fame virtues and vices, flowing from the fame general principles, but varied in a thousand different and contrary modes, according to that infinite variety of laws and cuftoms which is eftablished for the fame univerfal end, the prefervation of fociety. We shall feel the fame revolution of feafons, and the fame fun and moon * will guide the course of our year. The fame azurevault, befpangled with ftars, will be every where fpread over our heads. There is no part of the world from whence we may not admire those planets which roll, like ours, in different orbits round the fame central fun; from whence we may not discover an object still more stupendous, that army of fixed ftars hung up in the immense space of the universe, innumerable funs whofe beams enlighten and cherifh the unknown worlds which roll around them : and whilft I am ravished by fuch contemplations as thefe, whilft my foul is thus raifed up to heaven, it imports me little what ground I tread upon.

BRUTUS +, in the book which he writ on virtue, related that he had feen MARCELLUS in exile at Mitylene, living in all the happinefs which human nature is capable of, and eultivating, with as much affiduity as ever, all kinds of laudable knowledge. He added, that this fpectacle made him think that it was rather he who went into banifhment, fince he was to return without the other, than the other who remained in it. O MARCELLUS, far more happy when BRU-TUS approved thy exile, than when the commonwealth approved thy confulfhip! How great a man must thou have been, to extort admiration from him who appeared an object of admiration even to his own CATO! The fame BRU-TUS reported further, that CÆSAR overfhot Mitylene, becaufe he could not ftand the fight of MARCELLUS reduced to. a state fo unworthy of him. His restoration was at length obtained by the public interceffion of the whole fenate, who were dejected with grief to fuch a degree, that they feemed all upon this occasion to have the fame fentiments with BRU-TUS, and to be fuppliants for themfelves rather than for MARCELLUS*. This was to return with honour; but furely he remained abroad with greater, when BRUTUS could not refolve to leave him, nor CASAR to fee him; for both of them bore witness of his merit. BRUTUS grieved, and CÆSAR blushed to go to Rome without him.

Q. METFLLUS NUMIDICUS had undergone the fame fate fome years before, while the people, who are always the fureft inftruments of their own fervitude, were laying, under the conduct of MARIUS, the foundations of that tyranny which was perfected by CÆSAR. METELLUS alone, in the midft of an intimidated fenate, and outrageous multitude, refufed to fwear to the pernicious laws of the tribune SA-TURNINUS. His conftancy became his crime, and exile his punifhment. A wild and lawlefs faction prevailing againft him, the beft men of the city armed in his defence, and were ready to lay down their lives that they might preferve fo much virtue to their country. But he, having failed to perfuade, thought it not lawful to conftrain. He judged in the phrenfy of the Roman commonwealth, as PLATO judged in the dotage of the Athenian. METELLUS knew, that if his fellow-citizens amended, he fhould be recalled; and if they did not amend, he thought he could be no where worfe than at Rome. He went voluntarily into exile, and whereever he paffed he carried the fure fymptom of a fickly flate, and the certain prognoftic of an expiring commonwealth. What temper he continued in abroad will beft appear by a fragment of one of his letters which GELLIUS *, in a pedantic compilation of phrafes ufed by the annalift Q. CLAUDIUS, has preferved for the fake of the word frunifcor. "Illi "vero omni jure atque honeflate interdicti : ego ne-" que aqua neque igne careo : et fumma gloria frunifcor." Happy METELLUS ! happy in the confcience of thy own virtue ! happy in thy pious fon, and in that excellent friend who refembled thee in merit and in fortune !

RUTILIUS had defended Afia againft the extortions of the publicans, according to the ftrict juffice of which he made profefiion, and to the particular duty of his office. The Equeftrian order were upon this account his enemies, and the Marian faction was fo of courfe, on account of his probity, as well as out of hatred to METELLUS. The moft innocent man of the city was accufed of corruption. The beft man was profecuted by the worft, by APICIUS; a name dedicated to infamy +. now be deemed unhappy, when they who condemned him are, for that action, delivered down as criminals to all future generations? when he quitted his country with greater eafe than he would fuffer his exile to finish? when he alone durft refuse the dictator Sylla, and being recalled home, not only declined to go, but fled farther off?

WHAT do you propofe, it may be faid, by thefe examples, multitudes of which are to be collected from the memorials of former ages? I propofe to fhew that as change of place, fimply confidered, can render no man unhappy, fo the other evils which are objected to exile, either cannot happen to wife and virtuous men; or, if they do happen to them, cannot render them miferable. Stones are hard, and cakes of ice are cold : and all who feel them, feel them alike *. But the good or the bad events, which fortune brings upon us, are felt according to what qualities we, not they, have. They are in themfelves indifferent and common accidents, and they acquire ftrength by nothing but our vice or our weaknefs. Fortune can dispense neither felicity nor infelicity unlefs we co-operate with her. Few men, who are unhappy under the loss of an estate, would be happy in the poffeffion of it: and those, who deferve to enjoy the advantages which exile takes away, will not be unhappy when they are deprived of them.

IT grieves me to make an exception to this rule; but TULLY was one fo remarkably, that the example can be neither concealed, nor paffed over. This great man, who had been the faviour of his country, who had feared, in the fupport of that caufe, neither the infults of a defperate party, nor the daggers of affaffins, when he came to fuffer for the fame caufe, funk under the weight. He difhonored that banishment which indulgent providence meant to be the means of rendering his glory complete. Uncertain where he fhould go, or what he fhould do, fearful as a woman, and froward as a child, he lamented the lofs of his rank, of his riches, and of his fplendid popularity. His eloquence ferved only to paint his ignominy in stronger colors. He wept over the ruins of his fine house which CLODIUS had demolished : and his separation from TERENTIA, whom he repudiated not long afterwards, was perhaps an affliction to him at this time. Every thing becomes infolerable to the man who is once fubdued by grief*. He regrets what he took no pleafure in enjoying, and overloaded already, he fhrinks at the weight of a feather. CICERO's behaviour, in fhort, was fuch that his friends, as well as his enemies, believed him to have loft his fenfes +. CÆSAR beheld, with a fecret fatisfaction, the man, who had refused to be his lieutenant, weeping under the rod of CLODIUS. POMPEY hoped to find fome excufe for his own ingratitude in the contempt which the friend, whom he had abandoned, exposed himself to. Nay ATTICUS judged him too meanly attached to his former fortune, and reproached him for it. ATTICUS, whofe great talents were usury and trimming, who placed his principal merit in being rich, and who would have been noted with infamy at Athens, for keeping well with all fides, and venturing on none 1: even ATTICUS blufhed for TULLY, and the most plausible man alive assumed the style of CATO.

I HAVE dwelt the longer on this inftance, becaufe, whilft it takes nothing from the truth which has been eftablished, it teaches us another of great importance. Wife men are certainly fuperior to all the evils of exile. But in a ftrict

fense he, who has left any one passion in his foul unfubdued, will not deferve that appellation. It is not enough that we have studied all the duties of public and private life, that we are perfectly acquainted with them, and that we live up to them in the eye of the world : a passion that lies dormant in the heart, and has efcaped our ferutiny, or which we have observed and indulged as venial, or which we have perhaps encouraged, as a principle to excite and to aid our virtue, may one time or other deftroy our tranquility, and difgrace our whole character. When virtue has fteeled the mind on every fide, we are invulnerable on every fide : but ACHILLES was wounded in the heel. The leaft part, overlooked or neglected, may expose us to receive a mortal blow. Reafon cannot obtain the abfolute dominion of our fouls by one victory. Vice has many referves, which must be beaten; many ftrongholds, which muft be forced; and we may be found of proof in many trials, without being fo in all. We may refift the fevereft, and yield to the weakeft attacks of fortune. We may have got the better of avarice, the most epidemical difease of the mind, and yet be flaves to ambition *. We may have purged our fouls of the fear of death, and yet fome other fear may venture to lurk behind. This was the cafe of CICERO. Vanity was his cardinal vice +. It had, I queftion not, warmed his zeal, quickened his induftry, animated the love of his country, and fupported his conftancy against CATILINE: but it gave to CLODIUS an entire victory over him. He was not afraid to die, and part with eftate, rank, honor, and every thing which he lamented the loss of : but he was afraid to live deprived of them. " Ut vivus haec amitterem "." He would probably have met death on this occasion with the same firmness with which he faid to POPILIUS LAENUS, his client and his murderer, " Approach, veteran, and, if at least thou canft do this well, " cut off my head." But he could not bear to fee himfelf, and to be feen by others, stripped of those trappings which he was accustomed to wear. This made him break out into fo many shameful expressions. " Possum oblivisci qui fu-" erim? non fentire qui fim? quo caream honore? qua " gloria ?" And speaking of his brother ---- " Vitavi ne vi-" derem ; ne aut illius luctum squaloremque aspicerem, aut " me, quem ille florentissimum reliquerat, perditum illi af-" flictumque offerrem +." He had thought of death, and prepared his mind for it. There were occasions too where his vanity might be flattered by it. But the fame vanity hindered him in his profperous eftate from fuppofing fuch a reverse as afterwards happened to him. When it came, it found him unprepared, it furprised him, it ftunned him; for he was still fond of the pomp and hurry of Rome, "fu-" mum et opes, ftrepitumque Romae," and unweaned from all those things which habit renders necessary, and which nature has left indifferent.

place then may be borne by every man. It is the delight of many. But who can bear the evils which accompany exile ? You who ask the question can bear them. Every one who confiders them as they are in themfelves, inftead of looking at them through the falfe optic which prejudice holds before our eyes. For what ? you have loft your eftate : reduce your defires, and you will perceive yourfelf to be as rich as ever, with this confiderable advantage to boot, that your cares will be diminished. Our natural and real wants * are confined to narrow bounds, whilft those which fancy and cuftom create are confined to none. Truth lies within a little and certain compass, but error is immense. If we fuffer our defires therefore to wander beyond these bounds, they wander eternally. " Nefcio quid curtae semper abest rei." We become neceffitous in the midft of plenty, and our poverty encreases with our riches. Reduce your desires, be able to fay with the apoftle of Greece, to whom ERASMUS was ready to addrefs his prayers, " quam multis ipfe non " egeo!" banifh out of your exile all imaginary, and you will fuffer no real wants. The little ftream which is left will fuffice to quench the thirst of nature, and that which cannot be quenched by it, is not your thirst, but your diftemper; a diftemper formed by the vicious habits of your mind, and not the effect of exile. many advantages over him, be flaves to wants and neceffities of which he is ignorant? The rich, whofe wanton appetites neither the produce of one country, nor of one part of the world, can fatisfy, for whom the whole habitable globe is ranfacked, for whom the caravans of the east are continually in march, and the remotest feas are covered with fhips; thefe pampered creatures, fated with fuperfluity, are often glad to inhabit an humble cot, and to make an homely meal. They run for refuge into the arms of frugality. Madmen that they are, to live always in fear of what they fometimes with for, and to fly from that life which they find it luxury to imitate! Let us caft our eyes backwards on those great men who lived in the ages of virtue, of fimplicity, of frugality, and let us blufh to think that we enjoy in banishment more than they were masters of in the midst of their glory, in the utmost affluence of their fortune. Let us imagine that we behold a great dictator giving audience to the Samnite ambaffadors, and preparing on the hearth his mean repart with the fame hand which had fo often fubdued the enemies of the commonwealth, and borne the triumphal laurel to the capitol. Let us remember that PLA-TO had but * three fervants, and that ZENO had none +. contribution *. While ATTILIUS REGULUS beat the Carthaginians in Afric, the flight of his ploughman reduced his family to diftrefs at home, and the tillage of his little farm became the public care. SCIPIO died without leaving enough to marry his daughters, and their portions were paid out of the treafury of the flate; for fure it was juft that the people of Rome fhould once pay tribute to him, who had eftablifhed a perpetual tribute on Carthage. After fuch examples fhall we be afraid of poverty ? Shall we difdain to be adopted into a family which has fo many illuftrious anceftors ? fhall we complain of banifhment for taking from us what the greateft philofophers, and the greateft heroes of antiquity never enjoyed ?

You will find fault perhaps, and attribute to artifice, that I confider fingly misfortunes which come all together on the banished man, and overbear him with their united weight. You could fupport change of place if it was not accompanied with poverty, or poverty if it was not accompanied with the feparation from your family and your friends, with the lofs of your rank, confideration, and power, with contempt and ignominy. Whoever he be who reasons in this manner, let him take the following anfwer. The least of these circumstances is fingly fufficient to render the man miferable who is not prepared for it, who has not divested himself of that passion upon which it is directed to work. But he who has got the maftery of all his paffions, who has forefeen all thefe accidents, and prepared his mind to endure them all, will be fuperior to all of them, and to all of them at once as well as fingly. He will not bear the lofs of his rank, becaufe he can bear the lofs of his eftate :

but he will bear both, because he is prepared for both; because he is free from pride as much as he is from avarice.

You are feparated from your family and your friends. Take the lift of them, and look it well over. How few of your family will you find who deferve the name of friends? and how few among thefe who are really fuch? Erafe the names of fuch as ought not to ftand on the roll, and the voluminous catalogue will foon dwindle into a narrow compafs. Regret, if you pleafe, your feparation from this fmall remnant. Far be it from me, whilft I declaim againft a fhameful and vicious weaknefs of mind, to proferibe the fentiments of a virtuous friendfhip. Regret your feparation from your friends: but regret it like a man who deferves to be theirs. This is ftrength, not weaknefs of mind; it is virtue, not vice.

But the leaft uneafinefs under the lofs of the rank which we held is ignominious. There is no valuable rank among men, but that which real merit affigns. The princes of the earth may give names, and inftitute ceremonies, and exact the observation of them; their imbecillity and their wickedness may prompt them to clothe fools and knaves with robes of honor, and emblems of wildom and virtue : but no man will be in truth fuperior to another, without fuperior merit; and that rank can no more be taken from us, than the merit which eftablishes it. The supreme authority gives a fictitious and arbitrary value to coin, which is therefore not current alike in all times and in all places; but the real value remains invariable, and the provident man, who gets rid as fast as he can of the droffy piece, hoards up the good filver. Thus merit will not procure the fame confideration univerfally. But what then? the title to this confideration is the fame, and will be found alike in every circumstance by those who are wife and virtuous themthemfelves. If it is not owned by fuch as are otherwife, nothing is however taken from us; we have no reason to complain. They confidered us for a rank which we had; for our denomination, not for our intrinsic value. We have that rank, that denomination no longer, and they confider us no longer : they admired in us what we admired not in ourfelves. If they learn to neglect us let us, learn to pity them. Their affiduity was importunate : let us not complain of the eafe which this change procures us; let us rather apprehend the return of that rank and that power, which, like a funny day, would bring back thefe little infects, and make them fwarm once more about us. I know how apt we are, under specious pretences, to difguife our weakneffes and our vices, and how often we fucceed not only in deceiving the world, but even in deceiving ourfelves. An inclination to do good is infeparable from a virtuous mind, and therefore the man, who cannot bear with patience the lofs of that rank and power which he enjoyed, may be willing to attribute his regrets to the impossibility which he fuppofes himfelf reduced to of fatisfying this inclination. But let fuch an one know, that a wife man contents himfelf with doing as much good as his fituation allows him to do; that there is no fituation wherein we may not do a great deal; and that when we are deprived of greater power to do more good, we escape at the fame time the temptation of doing fome evil.

THE inconveniencies, which we have mentioned, carry nothing along with them difficult to be borne by a wife and virtuous man; and those which remain to be mentioned, contempt and ignominy, can never fall to his lot. It is impoffible that he who reverences himself should be despifed by others: and how can ignominy affect the man who collects all his ftrength within himfelf, who appeals from the judgment of the multitude to another tribunal, and lives independent of mankind and of the accidents of life? CATO loft the election of praetor, and that of conful; but is any one blind enough to truth to imagine that thefe repulfes reflected any difgrace on him? The dignity of those two magistracies would have been encreased by his-wearing them. They fuffered, not CATO.

You have fulfilled all the duties of a good citizen, you have been true to your truft, conftant in your engagements, and have purfued the intereft of your country without regard to the enemies you created, and the dangers you run. You fevered her interest, as much as lay in your power, from those of her factions, and from those of her neighbours and allies too, when they became different. She reaps the benefit of thefe fervices, and you fuffer for them. You are banifhed, and purfued with ignominy, and those whom you hindred from triumphing at her expence, revenge themfelves at yours. The perfons, in opposition to whom you ferved, or even faved the public, confpire and accomplish your private ruin. Thefe are your accufers, and the giddy ungrateful crowd your judges. Your name is hung up in the tables of profeription, and art joined to malice endeavours to make your best actions pass for crimes, and to stain your character. For this purpose the facred voice of the fenate is made to pronounce a lye, and those records, which ought to be the eternal monuments of truth, become the vouchers of imposture and calumny. Such circumstances as these you think intolerable, and you would prefer death to fo ignominious an exile. Deceive not yourfelf. The ignominy remains with them who perfecute unjuftly, not with him who fuffers unjuft perfecution. "Recalcitrat undique tutus." Suppose that in the act which banishes you, it was declared that you have some concontagious diftemper, that you are crooked, or otherwife deformed. 1 deformed. This would render the legiflators ridiculous *. The other renders them infamous. But neither one nor the other can affect the man, who in an healthful well-proportioned body enjoys a confcience void of all the offences ascribed to him. Instead of such an exile, would you compound, that you might live at home in eafe and plenty, to be the inftrument of blending these contrary interests once more together, and of giving but the third place to that of your country ? Would you profitute her power to the ambition of others, under the pretence of fecuring her from imaginary dangers, and drain her riches into the pockets of the meanest and vileft of her citizens, under the pretence of paying her debts? If you could fubmit to fo infamous a composition, you are not the man to whom I address my discourse, or with whom I will have any commerce: and if you have virtue enough to difdain it, why fhould you repine at the other alternative? Banishment from fuch a country, and with fuch circumstances, is like being delivered from prifon. DIOGENES was driven out of the kingdom of Pontus for counterfeiting the coin, and STRATONICUS thought that forgery might be committed in order to get banished from Scriphos. But you have obtained your liberty by doing your duty.

BANISHMENT, with all its train of evils, is fo far from being the caufe of contempt, that he who bears up with an undaunted fpirit against them, while fo many are dejected by them, erects on his very misfortunes a trophy to his honor: for fuch is the frame and temper of our minds, that nothing strikes us with greater admiration than a man intrepid in the midst of misfortunes. Of all ignominies an ignominious death must be allowed to be the greatest; and yet where is the blasphemer who will prefume to defame the death of SOCRATES *? This faint entered the prifon with the fame countenance with which he reduced thirty tyrants, and he took off ignominy from the place : for how could it be deemed a prifon when SOCRATES was there? PHOCION was led to execution in the fame city. All thofe who met the fad proceffion, caft their eyes to the ground, and with throbbing hearts bewailed, not the innocent man, but Juffice herfelf, who was in him condemned. Yet there was a wretch found, for monfters are fometimes produced in contradiction to the ordinary rules of nature, who fpit in his face as he paffed along. PHOCION wiped his cheek, fmiled, turned to the magiftrate, and faid, "Admonifh this man not to be fo " nafty for the future."

IGNOMINY then can take no hold on Virtue +; for Virtue is in every condition the fame, and challenges the fame refpect. We applaud the world when fhe profpers; and when fhe falls into adverfity we applaud her. Like the temples of the Gods, fhe is venerable even in her ruins. After this muft it not appear a degree of madness to defer one moment acquiring the only arms capable of defending us against attacks which at every moment we are exposed to? Our being miferable, or not miferable, when we fall into misfortunes, depends on the manner in which we have enjoyed prosperity. If we have applied ourfelves betimes to the ftudy of wifdom, and to the practice of virtue, thefe evils become indifferent; but if we have neglected to do fo, they become neceffary. In one cafe they are evils, in the other they are remedies for greater evils than themfelves. ZENO ‡ rejoiced that a fhipwreck had thrown him on the Athenian coaft : and he owed to the lofs of his fortune the acquifition which he made of virtue, of wifdom, of immortality. There are good and bad airs for the mind, as well as for the body. Prosperity often irritates our chronical diftempers, and leaves no hopes of finding any specific but in adversity. In such cases banishment is like change of air, and the evils we fuffer are like rough medicines applied to inveterate difeafes. What ANA-CHARSIS* faid of the vine, may aptly enough be faid of profperity. She bears the three grapes of drunkenness, of pleasure, and of forrow : and happy it is if the last can cure the mischief which the former work. When afflictions fail to have their due effect, the cafe is defperate. They are the last remedy which indulgent Providence uses: and if they fail, we must languish and die in misery and contempt. Vain men! how feldom do we know what to wifh or to pray for ? When we pray against misfortunes, and when we fear them most, we want them most. It was for this reason that PYTHAGORAS forbid his difciples to afk any thing in particular of God. The shortest and best prayer which we can addrefs to him, who knows our wants, and our ignorance in afking, is this: " Thy will be done."

TULLY fays, in fome part of his works, that as happinefs is the object of all philofophy, fo the difputes among philofophers arife from their different notions of the fovereign good. Reconcile them in that point, you reconcile them in the reft. The fchool of ZENO placed this fovereign good in naked virtue, and wound the principle up to an extreme beyond the pitch of nature and truth. A fpirit of oppofition to another doctrine, which grew into great vogue while ZENO flourifhed, might occafion this excefs. EPICURUS placed the fovereign good in pleafure. His terms were wilfully, or accidentally miftaken. His fcholars might help to pervert his doctrine, but rivalfhip enflamed the difpute; for in truth

there is not fo much difference between floicifm reduced to reafonable intelligible terms, and genuine orthodox epi-curifm, as is imagined. The felicis animi immota tranquillitas, and the voluptas of the latter are near enough a-kin : and I much doubt whether the firmest hero of the Portique would have borne a fit of the ftone, on the principles of ZENO, with greater magnanimity and patience than EPICURUS did, on those of his own philosophy *. However, ARIS-TOTLE took a middle way, or explained himfelf better, and placed happinefs in the joint advantages of the mind, of the body, and of fortune. They are reafonably joined; but certain it is, that they must not be placed on an equal foot. We can much better bear the privation of the last, than of the others; and poverty itfelf, which mankind is fo afraid of, " per mare pauperiem fugiens, per faxa, per ignes," is furely preferable to madnefs, or the ftone, though + CHRYsippus thought it better to live mad, than not to live! If banishment therefore, by taking from us the advantages of fortune, cannot take from us the more valuable advantages of the mind and the body, when we have them; and if the fame accident is able to reftore them to us, when we have loft them, banishment is a very flight misfortune to those who are already under the dominion of reafon, and a very great bleffing to those who are ftill plunged in vices which ruin the health both of body and mind. It is to be wifhed for, in favor of fuch as thefe, and to be feared by none. If we are in this cafe, let us fecond the defigns of Providence in our favor, and make fome amends for neglecting former opportunities by not letting flip the laft. "Si nolis fanus, * Compare the reprefentations made fo frequently of the doctrine of voluptytaught by EPICURUS, with the account which he himfelf gives in his letter to ME-NOECEUS, of the fenfe wherein he underftood this word. Vid. DIOG. LAER.

+ In his third book of Nature, cited by PLUTARCH, in the treatife on the contradictions of the Stoics. " curres hydropicus." We may fhorten the evils which we might have prevented, and as we get the better of our diforderly paffions, and vicious habits, we shall feel our anxiety diminish in proportion. All the approaches to virtue are comfortable. With how much joy will the man, who improves his misfortunes in this manner, difcover that those evils, which he attributed to his exile, fprung from his vanity and folly, and vanish with them ! He will see that, in his former temper of mind, he refembled the effeminate prince who could drink * no water but that of the river Choafpes; or the fimple queen, in one of the tragedies of EURIPIDES, who complained bitterly, that fhe had not lighted the nuptial torch, and that the river Ifmenus had not furnished the water at her fon's wedding. Seeing his former state in this ridiculous light, he will labor on with pleafure towards another as contrary as possible to it; and when he arrives there, he will be convinced by the ftrongeft of all proofs, his own experience, that he was unfortunate because he was vicious, not becaufe he was banished.

IF I was not afraid of being thought to refine too much, I would venture to put fome advantages of fortune, which are due to exile, into the fcale against those which we lose by exile. One there is which has been neglected even by great and wife men. DEMETRIUS PHALEREUS, after his expulsion from Athens, became first minister to the king of Egypt; and THEMISTOCLES found fuch a reception at the court of Perfia, that he used to fay his fortune had been lost if he had not been ruined. But DEMETRIUS exposed himfelf, by his favor under the first PTOLEMY, to a new difgrace under the fecond: and THEMISTOCLES, who had been the captain of a free people, became the vafial of the prince he had conquered. How much better is it to take hold of the proper 5

advantage of exile, and to live for ourfelves, when we are under no obligation of living for others? SIMILIS, a captain of great reputation under TRAJAN and ADRIAN, having obtained leave to retire, passed feven years in his retreat, and then dying, ordered this infcription to be put on his tomb : that he had been many years on earth, but that he had lived only feven *. If you are wife, your leifure will be worthily employed, and your retreat will add new luftre to your character. Imitate THUCYDIDES in Thracia, or XENOPHON in his little farm at Scillus. In fuch a retreat you may fit down, like one of the inhabitants of Elis, who judged of the Olympic games, without taking any part in them. Far from the hurry of the world, and almost an unconcerned spectator of what paffes in it, having paid in a public life what you owed to the prefent age, pay in a private life what you owe to posterity. Write as you live, without paffion; and build your reputation, as you build your happinefs, on the foundations of truth. If you want the talents, the inclination, or the neceffary materials for fuch a work, fall not however into floth. Endeavour to copy after the example of Scipio at Linternum. Be able to fay to yourfelf,

Rural amufements, and philofophical meditations, will make your hours glide fmoothly on; and if the indulgence of Heaven has given you a friend like LAELIUS, nothing is wanting to make you completely happy.

THESE are fome of those reflections which may ferve to fortify the mind under banishment, and under the other misfortunes of life, which it is every man's interest to prepare for, becaufe they are common to all men *: I fay they are common to all men; becaufe even they who efeape them are equally exposed to them. The darts of adverse fortune are always levelled at our heads. Some reach us, fome graze against us, and fly to wound our neighbours. Let us therefore impose an equal temper on our minds, and pay without murmuring the tribute which we owe to humanity. The winter brings cold, and we must freeze. The fummer returns with heat, and we must melt. The inclemency of the air diforders our health, and we must be fick. Here we are exposed to wild beafts, and there to men more favage than the beafts : and if we escape the inconveniencies and dangers of the air and the earth, there are perils by water and perils by fire. This established course of things it is not in our power to change; but it is in our power to affume fuch a greatnefs of mind as becomes wife and virtuous men; as may enable us to encounter the accidents of life with fortitude, and to conform ourfelves to the order of nature, who governs her great kingdom, the world, by continual mutations. Let us fubmit to this order, let us be perfuaded that whatever does happen ought to happen, and never be fo foolifh as to expostulate with nature. The best resolution we can take is to fuffer what we cannot alter, and to purfue, without repining, the road which Providence, who directs every thing, has marked out to us: for it is not enough to follow; and he is but a bad foldier who fighs, and marches on with reluctancy. We must receive the orders with spirit and chearfulnefs, and not endeavour to flink out of the poft which is affigned us in this beautiful disposition of things, whereof even our fufferings make a neceffary part. Let us addrefs ourfelves to God, who governs all, as CLEANTHES did in those admirable verses, which are going to lose part of their grace and energy in my translation of them.

Parent

Parent of nature ! Mafter of the World ! Where'er thy Providence directs, behold My fteps with chearful refignation turn. Fate leads the willing, drags the backward on. Why fhould I grieve, when grieving I muft bear ? Or take with guilt, what guiltlefs I might fhare ?

Thus let us fpeak, and thus let us act. Refignation to the will of GoD is true magnanimity. But the fure mark of a pufillanimous and bafe fpirit, is to ftruggle againft, to cenfure the order of Providence, and, inftead of mending our own conduct, to fet up for correcting that of our Maker. T H E

Infcribed to the PERSON, to whom alone it can belong ...

Moft Noble SIR,

AM one, whofe ambition it hath been, ever fince I came into the world, to diftinguish myself as a writer; in which, I fairly confess, I had not only the view of raifing my reputation, but that of establishing my fortune. A profpect, which feemed very reafonable in a time of general peace and universal affluence; in an age fo particularly polite, that it is even the fashion to appear knowing in all the elegant arts and fciences; and that to whatever branch of them a genius shall think fit to turn himself, he is fure it will be to one that is in vogue.

THE first esfays of my pen made a good deal of noise in the world : they filled foreign journals, and were translated into feveral languages. The Sorbonne, and both our mother Univerfities, returned me thanks for having reconciled feveral difputes, difputes, and folved feveral difficulties in chronology and hiftory, which had perplexed the learned world, from the impartial EUSEBIUS, down to the circumftantial PRIDEAUX; my philofophical Poems were received with the greateft applaufe; and it is well known, that if the gay part of the world read my ANTI-LUCRETIUS for amufement, the graveft divines have not difdained to borrow arguments from it in their difputes with the materialifts.

132 THE OCCASIONAL WRITER. Nº I.

ANIMATED by fuch fuccefs, in one part of my aim, I proceeded with indefatigable labor, till continual difappointments, in the other, rendered me at length more indifferent to that imaginary good, applause, and less patient of that real evil, want. I began then to compare my condition with that of feveral great authors both antient and modern; and finding upon the comparison that they had not been better treated than myself, I was foon led by my reflections to difcover the true reason of our ill fortune in the world ; I was foon convinced that they and I had been on a wrong purfuit; that ministers of state pay no respect to the brightest talents, when they are mifapplyed, and efteem all talents to be fo, which are not wholly employed about the prefent time, and principally dedicated to the fervice of their administration; neither can I fay this proceeding is unjust, how much foever I fuffer by it.

IF we write for pofterity, we muft not complain that the care of rewarding our merit is left to pofterity; and if we neglect to ferve the flate, those, who are appointed to prefide over it, break no rule of equity when they neglect us. SPENCER has been amply recompenced by posterity for his Fairy Queen; but the wise treasurer BURLEIGH declined the payment of an hundred pounds, which Queen ELIZABETH ordered dered him, and left this admirable poet to ftarve. Had SPEN-CER applied himfelf to more ferious ftudies, had he excelled in phyfics, in metaphyfics, or even in the first philosophy, or in theology, instead of excelling in wit and poetry, the "amabiles infaniae" of Horace, his usage would have been the fame no doubt. Even the greatest productions of these ftudies are but trifles in the account of a confummate states and may properly enough be diffinguished from the others in his fense, by the title of "infaniae feveriores."

OUR English ministers, to their honor be it spoken, hav at all times proceeded upon this admirable principle; the most excellent fermons, the most elaborate treatifes, have not been fufficient to procure the advancement of fome divines, whilft a forry pamphlet or a fpiritual libel has raifed others to the highest dignities of the church. As it has fared with mere divinity, fo has it fared with mere eloquence: as one never caufed the divine, fo the other never caufed the lawyer to be diffinguished. But we know that if either of them be employed in a court caufe, he ne-ver fails of making his fortune. The fame fate has attended writers of another kind; the celebrated Tatlers, and Spectators, had no reward except from bookfellers and fame. But when those authors made the discovery I have made, and applied their talents better, in writing the Englishman and the Freeholder, one was foon created a knight, and the other became fecretary of state. In short, without enumerating any more inftances, I may confidently affirm, that this has been the cafe from the days of BURLEIGH to this time; how much fooner it began to be fo, I hope, fir, you will not give me the leifure to enquire.

FROM the moment I refolved to become a flate-writer, I mentally devoted myfelf to your fervice : and I do it now in this this public and moft folemn manner. Employ me, fir, as you pleafe; I abandon myfelf intirely to you; my pen is at your difpofition, and my confcience in your keeping. Like a lawyer, I am ready to fupport the caufe, in which, give me leave to fuppofe that, I fhall be foon retained, with ardor; and, if occafion be, with fubtilty and acrimony. Like a Swifs, I will behave myfelf with equal boldnefs and fidelity; my pen is my fortune, and I think it as honorable to offer it, as offer my fword, without enquiring in a general battle, or in private fkirmifhes, at what relation or friend I ftrike. I cancel at once all former obligations and friendfhip, and will moft implicitly follow your inftructions in panegyric on yourfelf and friends, in fatyr on your adverfaries, in writing for or againft any fubject; nay, in writing for or againft the fame fubject, juft as your intereft, or even your paffions, may render it expedient.

I AM not ignorant that when CARNEADES offered to argue for virtue, and then against it, CATO proposed to drive that great philosopher and orator out of Rome. But CATO was a man of narrow principles and of too confined an understanding. He confidered virtue abstractedly, without any regard to time, to place, and to that vaft variety of conjunctures, which happens in the course of human affairs. In common life, morality is no doubt neceffary, and therefore Legiflators have been careful to enforce the practice of it; but whenever morality clashes with the interest of the state, it must be, and it always has been laid afide. Thefe are my opinions : and it is a great comfort to my confcience to find them confirmed by the practice of fome reverend perfons, whole examples ought to be of greater weight with me, than that of a wretched pagan. I shall therefore shew myself neither squeamish nor whimfical in purfuing the enterprize to which I offer my fervices, but shall remain firmly perfuaded, that all the moral vices, 7

vices, I may be occafionally guilty of in fo good a course, will be exalted into political virtues.

AFTER this plain and honeft account, which I have given of myfelf, it may be allowed me to fay, that you cannot find a perfon better qualifyed for your fervice, or more worthy to be lifted, among those who draw their pens in your cause, and of whom I am willing to hope that you have a greater and an abler body in referve, than you have hitherto judged proper to bring into the field.

It is evident, that a minifter, in every circumstance of life, stands in as much need of us public writers as we of him. In his prosperity he can no more subsist without daily praife, than we without daily bread, and the farther he extends his views the more necessary are we to his support. Let him speak as contemptuously of us as he pleases, for that is frequently the manner of those who employ us most, and pay us best; yet will it fare with his ambition as with a losty tree, which cannot shoot its branches into the clouds, unless it's root work into the dirt, from which it rose, on which it stands, and by which it is nourisfied.

IF a minifter falls into adverfity, fhall he take up the pen in his own defence? would not the cafe be as deplorable for him to be left to write, as for a prince to be left to fight in his own quarrel? Believe me, fir, whenever fortune abandons you, and who knows how foon that may happen, you will find yourfelf in a very forlorn flate. At the name of your fucceffor, those crowds, that attend your levee, will vanish like fpirits at the dawn of day. None will remain about you, but fuch as no other administration will condefcend to employ: and we may therefore very probably behold you, which would be

be a pitiful fight indeed, endeavouring to fecure a fafe retreat with H***** on one fide of you, and L****** on the other, two grotefque perfonages, exactly paired and nearly allyed, but furely as little fit to fupport a minifter in his decline, as to adorn his triumph. In fuch a turn as this, you may depend on my utmost efforts to keep up a fpirit for you: and I can make no doubt of being feconded by feveral of my fellow-writers, fince I am certain you will not feruple to fhare fome part of that fortune, which your industry and parfimony have raifed, with those who unite to fave the whole; and fince we fhall be reasonable enough not to expect above fixpence in the pound out of it, which cannot well amount to more than fifteen or twenty thousand pounds. A trifling fum for fo great a fervice and fo weighty a purfe!

You may perhaps, after all I have faid, be ftill apt to think that thefe are wild difcourfes, which have no other foundation but my defire to render myfelf neceffary. You may refine too much in your reflections on my conduct, and too little in thofe you make on your prefent fituation; or if you judge rightly of this, it is not impoffible but you may depend too much on your own vigilance and dexterity. Should any of thofe flatterers, who often betray their patrons into a fatal fecurity, fpeak to you much in the fame manner, as fleep addreffes himfelf to Palinurus in the fifth book of the Aeneis:

You would answer, I am perfuaded, as this Pilot did:

Mene falis placidi vultum, fluctulque quietos Ignorare jubes? mene huic confidere monstro?

But PALINURUS flept, and you know the confequence.

BE not therefore difpleafed if a fincere and zealous fervant roufes you, admonifhes you not to truft too much to appearances, and fhews you danger when perhaps you leaft expect it. You have failed long in a fmooth fea with gentle and favorable gales. We believe your courage and your abilities extremely great, but we believe it implicitly; for you have not had foul weather enough to give any confiderable proofs of either. Thefe circumftances, which might be abufed to infpire fecurity, I urge as reafons why you fhould be alarmed; for the element you have to deal with is by the laws of nature inconftant : and therefore the longer you have been without a ftorm the more reafon you have to expect one. There is no furer prefage of an hurricane than juft fuch a dead calm as I have obferved for fome time.

To fpeak without a figure : I would not have you flatter yourfelf, that the undifturbed quiet you have fo long enjoyed is merely owing to your own integrity and political merit, or to the uncommon profecution of hawkers and pamphleteers, which has been carried on by the direction of one of your principal inftruments, and indeed a most vigorous statesman. This quiet, fir, is owing to deep and inveterate defigns, which it becomes me to lay before you, without any regard to the cenfure I may incur, of revealing private converfation, and of breach of truft. Know then, that from the time you came into a fulnels of power, many were shocked at the manner in which you feized it, and at the use you made of it. They faid that both were hurtful, indecent, and even shameless. They went still farther, and affirmed, that your conduct was foolifh with regard to your own interest, fince it was foolish for a man to trust to one fingle expedient of government, who had feveral in his power; and VOL. L. efpecially  $\mathbf{T}$ especially to fuch an expedient as that of money, which would equally ferve to support him or to hang him. These perfons however, notwithstanding their discontent, resolved to lie quiet, till your mal-administration should become fo glaring as to justify their opposition, even in his majefty's sight : they faid they would not follow your example; and upon that occasion they remembered with some sharpness how you did your utmost to distress the king's affairs, upon the first discuss your example. the first difgust you received; nay they were malicious enough to call to mind fome perfonal reflections \*, which the heat of your imagination, and your familiarity with ma-jefty, betrayed you into, and for which they faucily wifhed what I dare not name. These feditious spirits flattered them-felves that you would do your own business when you had the full fwing of your power. They were acquainted, they faid, with the prefumption and distruct, with the boldness and pufillanimity, with the indiferetion and cunning, and with fifty other contradictions, which made up your character: and upon these they depended for putting a speedy end to your administration. This end they imagine to be now at hand: for thus they reason. A minister, who is attacked on his management of the public revenue, and has all the advantages of money and authority on his fide, may escape though he is guilty; but if he is innocent, the pro-ceedings against him in such a case must necessarily confirm his nower and establish his reputation to nothing more do ceedings against him in such a case mult necessarily confirm his power, and cftablish his reputation: nothing more de-firable than such an attack can happen to him. But our prefent minister, say these malignants, directly stops all en-quiry: in public he evades giving such accounts as the re-presentatives of the people have a right to demand; in private he is modess and different enough to laugh at those who think him such a fool as to furnish proofs against himfelf. Can a minister keep his ground long, who has no other defence than an implied confession of his guilt? will fuch 'a behaviour be endured in a nation hitherto free, and where there remain at least fome sparks of honor and of love The second second second second second of the country? THOUSE IN THE STREET OF HER STORE A STORE

THESE and many other reflections, which for brevity fake I omit, upon your particular conduct, and upon our domestic affairs, are frequently thrown out. But, fir, I confess to you, that I tremble when I hear the fame perfons difcourfe concerning the flate of the nation with regard to her foreign interests. They affirm and they offer to demonstrate, that the affairs of Europe never were in greater confusion, and that the part we take upon ourfelves is fuch an one, as no nation ever acted which was not betrayed, or whofe ministers were not infatuated. That you are for they fay, is past dispute, whether you have conducted these affairs yourself, or have left them to those men of eminent talents, who are concerned in this part of your administration : they infift that nothing could have happened to us, if you had intirely neglected our foreign interefts, worfe than what you have brought upon us, by running into the other extreme. For they afk, what is the fruit of your continual negotiations, fupported by a vast expence, and carried on as bufily as if the welfare of Great Britain had been at ftake in every difpute which has happened on the continent? They answer for you, and they defy you' to contradict them, that we have made the quarrels of other people our own ; and that we find ourfelves engaged as principals, in fome cafes where we have but a very remote concern, and in others where we have no concern at all. That our commerce fuffers and runs the rifque of being loft, not for a time, but for ever, in feveral branches, much more beneficial to us than the Oftend trade; and that our right to keep those important T 2 poffeffions, poffeffions, which were yielded to us in the moft folemn and authentic manner, is come, by dint of negotiation, from being indifputable, to be called in queftion. In a word, that to reftore the public tranquility, and to fettle our own interefts, we must engage in a new war and conclude a new peace : that you have contrived to make it impoffible for us to do one, without fighting against the very principle for which we have fought ever fince the revolution, or to attempt the other without lying under the particular circumstance, that our principal allies will be as much in earnest as our enemies to wreft out of our hands the chief advantages which we obtained by the treaty of Utrecht. At the time when these treaties were made, continue they, your great minister cried aloud and spared not. He complained, as much as any man, that the exorbitant power of France was not fufficiently reduced; and that the barriers of our allies, on the Rhine and in the Netherlands, were left too weak : and is it under his administration that we are to fee a pretence given to the French, and an opportunity thrown into their hands, of ftrengthening their power, and of extending their barriers? When I tell these objectors that your brother answers for the court of France, they laugh in my face, and reply, "Well he may, and fo might any of those, who were in the French interest, have done at the time when the triple alliance was broken, and France was encouraged by England to fall upon the Dutch." The ministers, who are answered for, would be as weak as he, who answers for them, if they did not fee the advantage in the prefent juncture, and did not take a fecret malicious pleafure in making us, who contributed fo much to reduce their power, become the inftruments of raifing it again. In the cafe of a war then, we have, according to this reafoning, which really, fir, has an air of truth, nothing fo much to fear as the affiftance of our chief ally; and in the cafe of a treaty, not only France, but Holland

Holland likewife, muft be againft us in that important article of Gibraltar and Port-Mahon, and in all particular advantages of commerce, which we have enjoyed, and may find it reafonable to pretend to. The late duke of Orleans, as dear a friend as he was to us, infifted ftrenuoufly, that we fhould give up the places before-mentioned; pretended a promife to this effect, and himfelf obliged in honor to fee this promife kept. Every one, who knows any thing of the tranfactions of thofe times, knows with how envious an eye the Dutch beheld the feparate privileges in trade, and the fole poffeffion of Gibraltar, and of the ifland of Minorca, which we obtained at the laft peace; and what lengths they would have gone to facilitate the negotiations, which at that time they oppofed, if they might have been admitted to a fhare in thefe advantages.

THE danger of an immediate invafion, and the engagements entered into by the emperor and the king of Spain to infult us with their fleets, and to conquer Great Britain and Ireland for the pretender, have been very industriously propagated by those, who are already in your pay, and by me, who ftand a candidate for this honor, but am hitherto a voluntier in your fervice. I am forry to tell you, fir, but Heaven forbid that I should conceal fo material a circumstance from your knowledge, we do not fucceed. We raife a fpirit, but this fpirit turns against you. There are more people than ever against the pretender; and zeal for fupporting the prefent establishment never ran higher. But this zeal is not any longer without knowledge : it is directed to it's proper object, and there is no poffibility of leading it hoodwinked to ferve any other purposes. Some incredulous wretches there are, who fmile when we talk to them of invafions and the pretender, and who content themfelves to reply, that the machine is very feafonably introduced, and according according to the rules of art. The greater number take fire, and lay this new diffrefs, which we threaten them with, at your door; for, they fay, that we difobliged Spain fome years ago, to tie the emperor the more firmly to us, and that we have fince that time difobliged the emperor, by affecting a clofer correspondence, and greater union of councils with France than ever was known between the two nations. They fend us to that excellent treatife, " The barrier treaty vindicated," to learn our true and lafting interest in foreign alliances, and there they pretend that we shall find the condemnation of all your measures : , they lament the miferable fcene, which they apprehend may foon be opened, his majefty's foreign dominions exposed to all the calamities of war, and perhaps in danger of being loft ; we ourfelves ftruggling against domestic enemies, and defending our coasts against invafions : these mischiefs brought upon us by a conjunction of the emperor, our old ally, with the king of Spain his rival; a conjunction fo unnatural, that nothing but the higheft refentment at our behavior to them both could have brought it about : in fhort, to finish up the picture, Great Britain reduced in this diffress to lean folely upon France, and the faith of that court to become our chief fecurity. a brash on a

UPON the whole matter, your enemies, fir, the fubftance of whole private conversation I have now honeftly reported to you, conclude very infolently that you have filled up the meafure of your iniquity and your folly, and that you must fink; or the nation must fink under the weight of that calamity which you have brought and fuffered to be brought upon her.

THINK myfelf obliged in honor to let the world know, that you have treated all my propofals to write in your fervice with a contempt unufual from one in your flation; for I have feen the times when every little paultry profitute of his pen found countenance and encouragement. Thefe wretches are fure of both, whenever there are any bad meafures to be juftified, or any bold ftrokes to be given; and the croaking of thefe ravens has always, in my imagination, boded fome mifchief or other to the commonwealth.

For this reafon I took upon me the character of a moft infamous libeller, in my firft addrefs to you, that I might be able to make a furer judgment of our prefent condition, and know better what expectations to entertain; fo that I own I am moft agreeably difappointed in not receiving any letter or 7 meffage meffage from you. I own, that inftead of biting you, I am fairly bit myfelf.

N° II. THE OCCASIONAL WRITER. 145

Some malicious refiners may pretend, perhaps, that an addrefs of fuch a nature, made in fo public a manner, could meet with no other treatment, even from a minifler who was willing to accept the propofal. Malice, I fay, may refine thus, and endeavor to depreciate a virtuous action, which cannot be denied, by fuppofing fuch motives to it as cannot be proved. The practice is too common, and efpecially where men are divided into parties, where public difputes create and nourifh private animofities, and where perpetual feuds irritate the natural malignity of the heart. But far be it from me to judge with fo little charity; I am willing to believe, fir, that you declined the offers made you, not on account of the public addrefs, by which they were conveyed, but becaufe you difdained to fupport a virtuous adminiftration by a venal pen.

WHEN I meet a man with loaded piftols in his pocket, or a dagger under his cloak, I fufpect that he is going upon no very honorable defigns. Houfebreakers and coiners have been detected, by having their tools found about them. Informers, fpies, and hireling fcribblers are the tools of an evil ftatefman; and when I fee all fuch difcouraged, and none of them about a minifter, I think myfelf obliged to fuppofe that his defigns are honorable, and his meafures directed to the public good.

I TAKE this opportunity therefore of begging your pardon for the trial I prefumed to make. The liberty indeed was great; but fince it has turned fo vaftly to your honor, I hope to be the more eafily forgiven. Shall I own it, fir ? my hopes go ftill farther; you difdained me under the feigned character which I affumed; from the fame principle of honor, from the Vol. I. U fame fame confeioufnefs of merit, you will, nay, you must afford me fome share of your esteem, when I appear, as I intend to do for the future, under my own. These papers shall breathe nothing but zeal to promote the honor of his majesty, the security of our present happy establishment, and in one word, the good of our country. The fame spirit, which animates you and me, shall animate them: and I cannot doubt of your approbation, when I co-operate with you to these purposes, which were certainly the sole inducements you had to enter into business; as it is manifest that you continue at the head of affairs for no other reasons.

THE truth is, however, (for I think it becoming a friendfhip, which is likely to grow as intimate as ours, that I fhould difguife nothing from you) two things have lately happened, which gave fome little fhock to my good opinion of you. The firft is an unwillingnefs you manifefted, that the true flate of the national debts fhould be known by the nation ; and the fevere cenfure you paffed on fuch perfons, as were defirous to give their countrymen a fair account of their condition in a part fo effential, that our being a nation, or not a nation, depends almost entirely, in this crifis, on our running or not running farther into debt. The other is the publication of a pamphlet fuppofed to be written by your direction, which is evidently defigned to keep us no lefs in the dark as to all our affairs abroad.

As to the first, that matter has been taken up already; and will, I doubt not, in all places, and in all manners, be fo thoroughly fifted, that we shall no longer be at a loss, either as to the revenue, and the real charges upon it, or as to the whole management of it. In which examination, fir, let me advise you, as a friend, to act an ingenuous part, that fuspicions.

cions may not increase, and that I may not be obliged to write to you in a stile, to which I shall turn my pen with reluctancy.

As to the latter, I hope, it will be likewife examined; and if I was able to take fuch a tafk on myfelf, I fhould, I am perfuaded, in doing fo, but make a fecond trial of you to your glory, and knit the bands of our friendship the closer, by anfwering a pamphlet of fo pernicious confequence, and writ with fo ill a defign. But I know my own unfitnefs to inform, to inftruct, and to roufe our countrymen, fome from their lethargy, and fome from their golden dreams. I may toll the alarm-bell, but perfons of greater ftrength and skill must be called upon to raise it, and to ring it out in the ears of the nation.

WE are grown more eafy, nay, more willing than ever, to be imposed upon; and we do more than half the work of those who find their account in deluding us. Almost every man confiders himfelf as a fingle perfon; those few, who extend their confiderations farther, feldom or never carry them beyond the narrow fyftem of a family, or a party. And thus it happens, that private interest is be-come the criterion, by which judgments are formed upon public affairs. The man, whoever he be, who is at any time in fashion, has nothing to do but to hold out that purfe, which the more he empties it, the furer he is to fill. After which let him declaim imperioufly, and affert boldly, without regarding proof, or condefcending to argue; let one of his tools write a pamphlet in much the fame strain, and the work is done, the opinion of mankind is fettled, the crowd repeats what the orator has faid, and the author writ; the clamor is echoed back on all fides, and thefe echoes, the reverse of all others, ftrengthen by repetition.

petition. Thus the corrupt lead the blind, and the blind lead one another; the still voice of reason is drowned in popular clamor, and truth is overwhelmed by prejudice.

THIS is a true account of what happens frequently; it is fo far from being a defeription drawn from imagination, that I could give feveral inflances, and perhaps fhall have occafion to quote fome, of fuch grofs impofitions on the common fenfe of mankind, offered in this manner, and offered with fuccefs, as no one would be bold enough to attempt putting on the weakeft man in Britain in private converfation.

THERE are therefore, GOD knows, but too many reafons for him to defpond, who entertains a thought of prevailing on the generality of people, to lay afide their prejudices, to check their paffions, and to confider the ftate of the nation in a due extent, and in a true light; and yet fuch is our condition, fuch a crifis are we in, that if we do not take and execute this refolution now, it may very probably be out of our power to do it hereafter to any good purpofe.

In our fenate we hear of great dangers, which we have to apprehend from abroad; and if we believe what is faid in a foreign * flate, we are exposed to very great ones at home. I am willing to hope, that both one and the other are magnified; but they may grow to be fuch in reality as they are reprefented to be, if we do not take more than ordinary care; first, to weigh in a just balance each of the many evils which threaten the nation; and fecondly, if we do not penetrate into every one of the causes, which have combined to bring them upon us. Should we fail in the first point, we may increase our dangers from abroad; by over-rating those at home, and by applying ourfelves folely to prevent the latter. But I believe no one thinks us difpofed to run into this extreme; we are much more likely to run into the other, and to increafe our dangers at home, by over-rating thofe which we apprehend from abroad. Should we fail in the fecond point, and neglect to penetrate into all the caufes which combine to bring our prefent diftrefs upon us, palliative remedies alone will be applied, in the ufe of which we may very probably expire after a tedious languor, but from which we cannot expect a radical cure.

CONVINCED therefore, that if we neglect the prefent moment, if every man does not think and write, and fpeak, and act for his country at this time, according to his beft talents, and according to the opportunities which he has of exerting them, we thall foon be in every fenfe a ruined nation.

I CONFESS, that I am impatient, however low my hopes of fuccefs run, till fome abler pen accepts the invitation, which "the enquirer into the reasons of the conduct of Great Britain" gives to every member of this community, till an enquiry is made, according to the right which he is pleafed to allow, into our present state, and into the measures which have led to it. But then this enquiry must be made upon better principles, and with an honefter view than he has, who made this, which lies before me : the perfon, who accepts his invitation, fhould be one who would blufh to follow his example; for he acts the part of an apologift, where he profess to act that of an impartial enquirer : he feems very zealous for the fuccels of the caufe which he pleads, and very indifferent what means he employs to procure this fuccefs; many things are difguifed, many are concealed, and hardly any are reprefented in their natural and proper light. Fallacy, fophifm, and a puerile puerile declamation, fwell the elaborate treatife ; but there was a defign perhaps, as well as habit, in fuch a manner of writing upon this occasion, fince a bad caufe must be defended by fuch means; and, therefore, by fuch pens as would difgrace and weaken a good one; fince it may possibly appear, upon a fair examination, that the caufe he is retained in is none of the best.

IF this fhould appear, I am apt to believe, that those, who fet him at work, will not be much concerned; they could not look on this pamphlet as any thing better than a momentary expedient to miflead and inflame. If it has that effect, if it ferves to keep up the delution till all the jobs, which are to be done, are done; the ends which they proposed to themselves, are perhaps answered. But if this nation should awaken to a fense of their true interest, and if the British spirit should once more revive amongst us, it might very well happen that these perfons would have made a faulty reckoning; for furely, after having exercifed the juftice of the nation, by cenfuring in one parliament a treaty of peace, which has been approved in another, it will not be thought strange, if we punish, at one time or another, those who have negotiated us out of peace and tranquility, into war and confusion, altho' the wisdon of the nation should think fit to support, for the prefent, the meafures of these ministers.

THE enquirer fuppofes the whole face of affairs in Europe to have received the great alteration which he is fo much furprifed at, within the fpace of the laft year; but I cannot agree with him, that the turn has been fo fudden as he reprefents it. "The calm hardly to be paralleled by any past prospect," as this great master of still expresses himself by a figure of Hibernian rhetoric, was accompanied, as calms frequently are, by many many figns of an approaching ftorm; which figns did not escape the observation of the failors, and even passengers in our veffel, tho' they escaped that of our able pilots, who were, it feems, all that while in a most ferene fecurity. The particular evils, which we apprehend at prefent, were known to our ministers above a year ago, if it be true, as the enquirer affirms, that the treaty of Hanover, and negotiations in confequence of it, are "the steps, which the court of " Great Britain thought fit to take as foon as possible, af-" ter the danger we were in appeared evident beyond all " contradiction." But before the particular danger appeared, the general danger was evident enough. When the treaty of Vienna was made, our ship struck; but we had been failing among rocks and fhoals long before, ever fince. we quitted our port, and launched out to fea, on the wife errand of convoying other people fafe to theirs.

HE therefore, who is defirous to make the enquiry propofed, in fuch a manner as may be of real ufe to the public, muft take up things much higher than this partial writer was inftructed to do. Many things happened during the congrefs of Cambray, which deferve to be explained; and there are treaties both previous and fubfequent to the quadruple alliance, which deferve to be commented upon.

NAV, there feems to be a neceffity of going farther back than this reign, or even than this century, if we defign to be thoroughly acquainted with the original of our prefent diffrefs. When we have taken a general furvey of the conduct of Britain, with relation to the affairs of Europe, for about two hundred years, we fhall come much better prepared to difcover our true point of intereft; and by obferving how we have departed from it, we fhall learn how to return to it.

152 THE OCCASIONAL WRITER. Nº II.

THIS part I will venture to undertake; and what I fhall fay upon it, may ferve at leaft as an introduction to that work, which, I hope, will be performed by fome abler hand.

THE foundations of the grandeur of France, and those of the grandeur of the house of Austria, were laid very near at the fame period. FERDINAND and ISABELLA began the latter; and in CHARLES the fifth their grandfon, and almost imme. diate fucceffor, it was carried up to that exorbitant height, which made Europe tremble under his reign, under that of his fon, and upon fome occafions even later. The progrefs which France made was not fo rapid, but was perhaps as fure; she shared with her rival the spoils of the house of Burgundy, by the address and vigor of LEWIS the eleventh, who not only extended the bounds, and ftrengthened the frontier of that close compact body, whole very figure is an addition to the force of it, but affured its inward tranquility better, and rendered that monarchy more formidable than it had been in the time of his predeceffors, when the authority of the prince was lefs.

THE forming of two fuch powers, in Europe, made it the intereft of all other princes and flates, to keep as much as poffible a balance between them. And here began that principle of Englifh policy to be eftablifhed, which, however true and wife in itfelf, has hardly ever been truly and wifely purfued.

WE fhould take things rather too high, if we went up to the reign of king HENRY the feventh, tho' even there fome obfervations are to be made, which have relation to our prefent fubject.

Nº II. THE OCCASIONAL WRITER. 153

FREQUENT and important occafions of acting on this principle prefented themfelves in the time of HENRY the eighth. Some he took, fome he neglected, and fome he managed ill; for to fay the truth, the whole conduct of this prince was a continued courfe of extravagance, violence, and levity: his vices glared through the beft actions of his life. He exercifed the tyranny, and practifed the bloody precepts of the church of Rome, even while he was delivering us from the papal yoke. His deliberations for peace or war feemed often to have a mixture of humor in them; and his own paffions, as well as WOLSEY's, made him hold the balance of Europe, if he did hold it, with an uneven hand.

THE reformation, which began in his time in Germany, and which was completed by EDWARD the fixth, and by queen ELIZABETH, in England, gave occafion to a new divifion of interefts; and made it of the utmost importance to the welfare of this nation, not only to preferve a balance between the two great powers of Europe, but to fupport the protestant cause against them both. The first of these was to be done by throwing as much as the occasion might require of our weight, fometimes into one, and fometimes into the other of these s; but the latter could be effected by nothing less than a constant adherence to that fide which was for a long time the weakest, and which, I doubt, is fo still.

BOTH these principles were purfued by queen ELIZABETH, with the greatest wisdom, and with the greatest fuccess. To illustrate this fully, it would be necessary to run through the annals of her glorious reign. But a few general observations will suffice for our present purpose. When she came to the crown, the nation was divided between two powerful parties, exasperated by religious zeal; Ireland was papist, Scotland was under the immediate influence of France, and the queen of that kingdom, married to the dauphin of France, difputed her title to the crown of England. In fhort, the fureft fupport she had amidst all these difficulties, besides the firmness of her mind, and the penetration of her under-flanding, was in Philip the second, whom she disobliged by refusing to make him her husband; and who could not fail of being, on many accounts, as he proved to be, her most implacable and dangerous enemy. She kept measures for a while with him, nay, perhaps, with the court of Rome, and foon fettled her government, and eftablished her power: her own kingdom was the first and principal object of her care; and fhe judged very wifely, that, in order to be con-fiderable abroad, fhe must begin by making herfelf fo at. home. Her revenue was administered with the utmost frugality, industry was encouraged, manufactures improved, and commerce extended: she was far from neglecting foreign alliances, but her negotiations were conducted with great art and little expence, and the engagements fhe took. were always neceffary, feldom chargeable. She fupported the protestant cause in France, with good offices, with loans of money; and upon fome prefling occasions with troops. But she never depended on the gratitude of HENRY the fourth, and was neither surprised nor unprepared when he made returns very unworthy of the obligations he had to her. The Dutch could not have fustained their revolt from Spain, nor have formed their commonwealth, without her affiftance. She helped them powerfully, but fhe exacted cautionary towns from them, as a fecurity for her reimbursement, whenever they should be in a condition to pay; and in the mean time as a check, to keep them under the influence and direction of England. By fuch methods as thefe, her own country grew rich and flourishing, while she not only preferved a balance of power abroad, but contributed extremely to reduce Spain from being the terror of Europe,

to that low flate, into which it fell under the fucceffors of king Philip the fecond.

THE reign of king JAMES the first, is not to be read without a mixture of indignation and contempt. He came to the crown with great advantages; but a bad head, and a worse heart, hindered him from improving any of them. He lost the opportunity of uniting the two kingdoms; he suffered his revenue to be ill administered; his ministers were notoriously corrupt, and he himself very profuse.

INSTEAD of affwaging, he fomented difputes by his pedantry; eftablished fuch principles of government, and raifed fuch a spirit in the clergy, as could hardly fail to produce the terrible effects which followed in the reign of his son.

SUCH a management of domestic affairs would have put it out of his power, if it had been his inclination to act a wifer part in foreign affairs: but he had no fuch inclination. Twelve years he fuffered himfelf to be amufed with the Spanish match; he countenanced at least the popish, and he abfolutely neglected the protestant interest, both in France and Germany. Inftead of helping the difpolitions, which appeared, to take the imperial crown out of the house of Auftria, he favored the caufe of that family, and abandoned his own children to the refentment of the emperor and the popish league. When the thirty years war began in 1618, the liberty of Germany, and the whole protestant interest, were in the utmost peril. The fole measures, which he took for the fupport of either, confisted in fimple embasfies, ridiculous letters, and languid negotiations. Queen ELIZABETH defeated the ambitious defigns of the Spanish branch of the Auftrian family; king JAMES favored those of the German branch of the fame family.

156 THE OCCASIONAL WRITER. Nº II.

OVER the fucceeding reign, and all that followed, to the reftoration of king CHARLES the fecond, let us draw a veil.

DURING this time the decay of the Spanish monarchy increased apace, the liberties of Germany were afferted, and the power of the emperor bounded by the treaties of Weftphalia; but another power, that of France, began to rife very fast on the foundations laid long ago. RICHELIEU and MAZARINE had given that crown a great superiority in the affairs of Europe, and the prince who wore it, resolved to maintain and augment this superiority, at the expence of all his neighbours.

THE attack which LEWIS the fourteenth made upon the Low Countries in 1667, fhewed, both in the manner of it, and in the pretence taken for it, what Europe had to expect from this prince. On this occafion the triple alliance was made; and happy had it been, if the fame principles of policy had continued to prevail. But the king who fat on our throne, with better fenfe and more courage than his grandfather, was at leaft as unfit as he to defend the liberties of Europe, and perhaps more unfit to defend the proteftant intereft.

KING CHARLES the fecond joined his councils and his arms to those of France; and when he could not openly affish, he privately abetted the usurpations of that crown. He might, by conforming to the defires of his people, who were in his and their true interest, have had the immortal honor of preferving a balance of power in Europe; but he chose the eternal infamy of helping to destroy this balance; and not content to be the ally of a prince, whose enemy he ought to have been, he condescended to be his instrument, and even his pensioner. This conduct, which took fo much strength from from that fide, which was already too weak, and which added fo much to that which was already too ftrong, eftablifhed the abfolute fuperiority of France, and left Spain, Germany, Italy, and the Seventeen provinces, nay and Britain too, in confequence, at her mercy.

THIS terrible face of things did not mend on the acceffion of king JAMES the fecond to the throne. Whatever his politics were, religion would have got the better of them. Bigotry muft have cemented a clofe union between him and the king of France, who was alone able and willing to affift him in the work he had undertaken at home. But the greatnefs of our danger, as it fometimes happens, faved us; and in faving us, faved all Europe. The revolution in our government caufed a total change in our conduct. A prince, who had been long at the head of a weak but refolute oppofition to France, mounted our throne; and the principles of maintaining a balance between the great powers of Europe, and of fupporting the proteftant intereft, came once more into fashion in this kingdom, after having been for near a century, either neglected, or acted against.

THE body of the nation refumed thefe principles with warmth, and has fupported them ever fince with unparalleled fpirit and vigor. But let it be faid without offence, fince it may be faid with truth, and fince it is neceffary that it fhould be faid upon this occafion, we have not purfued them with as much wifdom as zeal. If we have erred in our politics fince the revolution, it is fure we have erred on the right fide. But errors on the right fide are errors ftill, and may, in time, prove as fatal as errors on the other; and are, in one refpect at leaft, more dangerous, as they are lefs attended to at firft, or guarded againft.

158 THE OCCASIONAL WRITER. Nº II.

BETWEEN all extremes there is a certain middle point, which men of genius perceive, and to which men of honor adhere in private and in public life.

THUS avarice and prodigality are at an immenfe diffance; but there is a fpace marked out by virtue between them, where frugality and generofity refide together. Thus again, to abandon thofe, whom it is our intereft to fupport, is an excefs of folly; and to fupport the interefts of other people, to the ruin of our own, is an excefs of folly likewife. But there are lines defcribed by prudence, between thefe two exceffes, within which our common interefts meet, and may proceed together.

It would be an invidious as well as tedious tafk, to go through all the inftances, which might be produced; wherein we have, under pretence of preferving a balance of power in Europe, gratified the paffions of particular men, and ferved the turns of private intereft, till we have rendered that principle, in a reafonable purfuit of which our fafety and our glory confift, the occafion of real danger to the intereft, and of reproach to the wifdom of our nation. A few of thefe inftances will fuffice to deduce the progrefs of our miftaken policy, to evince the truth of what has been advanced in general, and to fix the application of the whole to the prefent conjuncture; wherein I apprehend, that we are about to pay the price not only of late errors, but a long feries of errors.

THE war, which began in 1688, was no doubt a very neceffary war. It was neceffary to extinguish the rebellion in Scotland; it was neceffary to reduce Ireland; it was neceffary to affert the new establishment of our government. These were our immediate interests; but we had remote interests likewife

likewife concerned, which were of themfelves fufficient to engage us to enter, at leaft as allies and friends, into the war. The empire was in danger by the taking of Philipfburgh, and other enterprizes of the French; and Holland lay once more open to their invafions, by the feizing of Bonne. In the courfe of this war, Ireland was reduced; all the efforts againft the government in England and Scotland were defeated; and, by the peace, France acknowledged king. WILLIAM.

As unfortunate as we had been on the Rhine and in Flanders, every thing, which the French had taken in the courfe of the war from our allies, was reftored at Ryfwic; and Luxembourg, which France had ufurped before the war, was likewife given up. Thus far all was well. The points, which England contended for, were carried; and our allies recovered by treaty more than they had loft by war.

IF a common guaranty of this treaty had been entered into as foon as those powers acceded who refused to fign when England and Holland did, the tranquility of Europe would have been better fecured than it was at this time, or at the peace of Nimeguen; at least England would have engaged, as far as it became her to do, even upon the principle of maintaining the balance of power, and no farther.

But, inftead of taking this ftep, we took another, which proved fatal in it's confequences. The death of CHARLES the fecond, king of Spain, without children, was then in profpect. The pretentions of France were known, and it's power had been lately felt. Whenever the cafe fhould happen, a war feemed to be unavoidable. But this war muft have been made by France alone, for the conqueft of the Spanifh monarchy; which, as powerful as we then thought her, and as infolent infolent as fhe really was, we fhould not have engaged in lightly. Neither could fhe have fupported it, if fhe had, fince even with Spain on her fide, fhe could not have fupported the laft, if the mines of Peru had not been unaccountably left open to her.

 $O_N$  the apprehension, however, of fuch a war, and on the fpecious pretence of preferving a balance of power in Europe, the partition treaties were made; that is, without the know-ledge of the king of Spain, we disposed of his inheritance; without the confent of the emperor, and in concert with his adverse party, we fettled the rights contested between the house of Austria and Bourbon; and we engaged to make this partition good by arms.

I DO NOT ENTERING THE REAL AND THE AND TH

WHENEVER this balance is in real danger by the exorbitant growth of one power, or by the union of more, other princes and flates will be alarmed of courfe. All of them ought, and moft of them will take measures for their common fecurity. But the wife councils amongst them will, upon every fuch occasion, proportion their measures, and the engagements they enter into, not according to the nature of the danger confidered generally, but according to the immediate or remote relation, which it has to each of them; and according to the ftrength,

To do otherwife, would be to lofe fight of our own particular interest in the pursuit of a common interest. It would be nothing better than fetting up for the DON QUIXOTES of the world, and engage to fight the battles of all mankind. The state, which keeps its own particular interest constantly in view, has an invariable rule to go by; and this rule will direct and limit all it's proceedings in foreign affairs; fo that fuch a flate will frequently take no fhare, and frequently a fmall fhare in the difputes of it's neighbours, and will never exert it's whole ftrength, but when it's whole is at ftake. But a ftate, who neglects to do this, has no rule at all to go by, and must fight to negotiate, and negotiate to fight again, as long as it is a state; because, as long as it is a state, there will be difputes among it's neighbours, and fome of thefe will prevail at one time, and fome at another, in the perpetual flux and reflux of human affairs.

IF the kings of France and Spain, and the emperor, had made an agreement amongst themselves, about the fuccession to the dominions of Spain, confiftent with the common interest of Europe, and confidering the partiality which the court of Spain had, at that time, for the house of Austria, there was little room to fear, that fuch an agreement would have been too favorable to the house of Bourbon. If any fuch partition had been made, I fay, no objection would have remained, either as to the right or manner of making it, and we might have escaped a war. If these princes had done nothing of this kind, we might have been engaged upon the king of Spain's death, as I faid before, in a defenfive war, for preferving the dominions of our old allies, and VOL. I. the Y

the liberties of Europe, against the usurpations of our antient enemy. But instead of waiting to be auxiliaries in a defensive war, we put ourselves under a necessity of being principals in an offensive one; and by affecting to fecure the balance of power, when we had neither call nor right to meddle, we reduced our affairs to this absurd alternative, that we must either make an offensive war as principals, against the emperor and Spain, in order to conquer for France, which was equally impolitic and unjust, or against France and Spain, in order to conquer for the emperor, under the greatest difadvantages possible; which happened to be the cafe.

THE partition treaties forced the king of Spain to make a will in favor of the houfe of Bourbon; and the Spaniards threw themfelves into the arms of France, to prevent the difmemberment of their monarchy.

THUS was the balance of power loft by our meddling where we had nothing to do, even before it could have been in danger, if we had not meddled at all. We loft it, and the emperor knew that we muft reftore it for our own fakes, which could be done no otherwife than by conquering for him; and this he left us to do the beft we could. While we fought his battles, he lent us the Auftrian title, the perfon of his fon, the prefent emperor, and little elfe. We neglected every thing, and facrificed every thing in the profecution of this quarrel. But the imperial councils were fo far from neglecting any thing, or facrificing any thing to it, that they feemed wholly taken up for fome years in fettling the affairs of Hungary to their fatisfaction; and they facrificed to an idle refinement in politics the greateft opportunity which we ever had, or muft ever hope to have; I mean that of deftroying

IF ever people were called upon to think of their own immediate interefts, we were fo at this time. Whether we could then have put an end to the expensive war we were engaged in for the house of Austria, in a manner confistent with the public interest of Europe, I am not able to determine. Certain it is in fact, that far from entertaining any fuch thoughts, we redoubled our fpirit and our efforts in the profecution of the war. As we acquired new allies, we enlarged our engagements; and as we obtained new victories, we extended our views. The grand alliance formed by king WILLIAM, for reftoring a balance of power in Europe, proposed no other objects than sufficient barriers, security to trade, and reasonable satisfaction to the house of Auftria*. These were thought, by that great prince, all the points necessary to be contended for. But, instead of confining ourfelves to fo narrow a plan, we judged that the balance of power could not be effectually reftored, unlefs we wrested the whole Spanish monarchy from the house of Bourbon, to give it to the houfe of Auftria. For this prize we fought, and fought with as little regard to all other interefts; as if we had defended our own altars, and · our own houses.

Must we not acknowledge, upon this occafion, fir, the fhortnefs of human forefight? The very meafure, which we purfued at fo great expence of blood and treafure (becaufe nothing lefs could fecure the balance of power in Europe, and even the trade of this kingdom, and the protestant fucceffion, against the invasions of France and the pretender) that very

IF we had fucceeded in our attempts to fet the crown of Spain on the head of the prefent emperor, and his bro-ther the emperor JOSEPH had lived, would our danger from the union of these two brothers not have been at least as great as that which is apprehended from the union of the prefent emperor, and of the prefent king of Spain, rivals almost from their cradles, and by a long course of opposition, fuch inveterate enemies, that they could hardly be kept, as the enquirer affures us, " within the bounds of " common decency towards one another, by all the address " of two powerful mediators in a public treaty?" Might not the fame address, that threw these enemies into one another's arms, (for it will appear they did not run thither fo unaccountably) and united them in defigns deftructive to the commerce and rights of other nations, have fucceeded equally well between the two brothers, especially fince, in this cafe, there would have been but half the work to do? The union would have been formed to our hands, and our addrefs could only have been fhewn, in giving fuch proper provocations, as might have infpired the defigns.

WOULD CHARLES have been lefs favorable to the trade of his brother's fubjects, at any place in the Auftrian dominions, than PHILIP fhews himfelf to the trade of the fubjects of CHARLES ? Would JOSEPH not have concurred to affift his brother to regain Gibraltar, and the ifland of Minorca, at leaft, as zealoufly as we can fuppofe that CHARLES concurs to affift PHILIP, either by good offices, or, if you pleafe, to have it fo, by force of arms ? Would not a league between the two brothers have been as much a popifh league as that which we are fo much alarmed at, between the furviving brother and

and the prefent king of Spain? Would not the first have made use of the pretender, as the latter is faid to do, and as every prince or state, with whom we happen to be at variance, may be provoked to do? In fhort, I may fafely challenge the author of the enquiry, as great a cafuift as he is, to fhew any difference between the two cafes which I have compared together, except this, that we might have been exposed to greater dangers from that settlement of Europe, which we fought to bring about, than we are, or can probably be exposed to, from that which we were fo follicitous to prevent. But the cafe is still stronger than I have put it. For even after the death of the emperor JOSEPH, his prefent imperial majesty continued his claim to the whole Spanish monarchy; and you, and I, and many of us, continued to fupport his claim, and opposed with all our force the negotiations of peace, which were begun upon a different principle. Happily we failed of fuccess. The many, who remonftrated, "That we were hastening apace to make him a " power too great and too formidable; and that we fhould " find in him, at last, the enemy we then dreaded only in " another," prevailed. Had they not, in what a condition fhould we have been at this time? Would the emperor have been more grateful, or lefs powerful, with the crown of Spain and the Indies, added to fo many others? If the union between him and the king of Spain is fo formidable to us, how much more reafon should we have had to apprehend the confequences to our trade, and in the end, to our liberties and our religion themfelves, if thefe divided powers had been united in the same ungrateful person, as it is the mode at prefent to call the emperor?

IF Don CARLOS fhould marry the eldeft arch-duchefs, if the emperor fhould die without iffue male, if the king of France fhould die without iffue male, if the prince of Afturias 5 fhould fhould die without iffue male, and the princes of the blood in France and Spain should not support the validity of the renunciations, all which is within the bounds of poffibility, " Don CARLOS may be at once emperor, king of France, " and king of Spain ; and have the vaft ftrength and riches " of all these powers united and centered in him." This terrible object stares our speculative enquirer in the face, and difturbs his head. It difturbs, very probably, those excellent heads, who fet him a fcribbling, who can fee fo far into futurity at prefent; and who, not very long ago, were unable to difcern the nearest and most probable events. Let us confider now, what confequence of this kind might have happened, if, for fecuring a balance of power in Europe, the prefent emperor had been likewife king of Spain. If then the king of France, inftead of marrying the daughter of STANISLAUS, had married the eldest daughter of the emperor, which furely had been within the bounds of possibility, there would remain but one chance at this time, viz. the emperor having a fon, to fave us from the combination of fuch a power, as would in reality form what we commonly, tho' improperly, call univerfal monarchy; fince there would be nothing elfe, which could hinder LEWIS the fifteenth, from being king of France, of Spain, and of the Weft-Indies, mafter of all the Auftrian dominions, and, by confequence, emperor. The truth I would inculcate by what I have faid is this, that as the partition treaty threw too much weight into the scale of Bourbon, to the destruction of the balance of power in Europe; fo the neceffary confequence of the war we made to reftore this balance must have been, if we had fucceeded according to our defires, to deftroy it again, by throwing too much weight into the fcale of Auftria. This has been proved by the event, and the enquirer demonstrates it, or he demonstrates nothing.

As far, therefore, as we have brought this deduction, that is, to the end of the laft war, it is manifest that the notion of preferving a balance of power in Europe has, for the reafons touched upon above, and which every man will extend in his own thoughts, proved to us like an ignis fatuus; in the purfuit of which we have been led from difficulty to difficulty, and from danger to danger.

IF we enquire, whether the treaties of Utrecht and Baden did afford us an opportunity of correcting our errors, and of profiting by our experience, it will be found that they did; fince all the points, which had been in conteft were then fettled, and this fettlement acquiefced in by all the parties to the war, except the emperor, who kept up ftill his claim againft PHILIP the fifth.

But the keeping up this claim could not have endangered the public tranquility. He was unable to attack Spain for want of a maritime force, or even Sicily, which was covered befides by the guaranty of the neutrality of Italy; and this neutrality ferved likewife to hinder Spain from attacking him. There might have been a war of the pen, and there could have been no other between them.

At the worft, if the king of Spain had invaded any part of Italy, the guarantees of the neutrality might eafily have prevented fuch an attempt; and in fo doing they would have observed the treaties, and kept the peace, far from breaking either one or the other.

In fuch a ftate of foreign affairs, we had certainly an opportunity of looking carefully after our own. The king of Spain had no pretence to alk for any alteration in the fettlement fo lately established with his own confent; and the emperor emperor could not have complained of his majefty for obferving treaties, which he would not have made, but which he found made; nor for refufing to enter into a new war on this account.

WHETHER we improved this opportunity, or not, what our prefent condition is, and by what fteps we have been reduced to it, I leave to the enquiry of fome perfon more capable than myfelf. Let it fuffice, that I have endeavored to remove fome delufions, which have affected even men of the beft understandings, and the beft intentions; and to prepare the minds of my countrymen to confider, at this critical point of time, what our national interest really is, without being biaffed in their judgments by what they may have thought of it on any former occasions.

JUST after I had fent thefe fheets to the prefs, a paper, intitled, "A letter to the Occafional Writer," was brought to me. I have read this ftiff pedantic piece, with more attention than it deferves, tho' I read it curforily; and notwithftanding the pains which the author takes to pafs for you, I am ready to acquit you of the fcandal. You would certainly have writ better, and your pen at leaft would not have appeared fo near a-kin to that of the Craftfman Extraordinary.

Who this author fuppofes the Occafional Writer to be, I cannot guefs. Such a wretch as he defcribes is, I believe, to be found no where, nor even fuch an image of guilt and mifery any where, except in the horrors of his own mind. I fhall therefore, with a decent contempt for this fcurrilous fcribbler, and without any concern about his imaginary correfpondent, continue thefe inoffenfive letters, in great tranquility and fedatenefs, as often as occafion invites me, or as I find myfelf in the humor.

Most Noble SIR,

HEN I writ the poftfcript to my laft letter, I believed firmly that the anfwer to the Occafional Writer was neither writ by you, nor publifhed by your order. Many confiderations determined me to this opinion. For inftance : I could not think, that in order to vent yourfelf in a fit of railing, you would draw a picture out of your own imagination, which cannot pafs for that of the perfon who writ to you, even in the low and vile character he affumed, and which you will hardly venture to own that you meant to be the refemblance of any man in Britain. I could not perfuade myfelf that you would give occafion, as I apprehend very much that you may have done, to the drawing of another picture after the life, which no one will miftake, and which you will not be curious to place in your collection of paintings. I have, with the reft of mankind, a great regard for fome of your friends; but I have, with the reft of mankind likewife, a great regard for your particular enemies, among whom it feemed impoffible to me that you, who know them fo well, fhould prefume to find either flaves or cri-minals, or infolvent debtors. I dare affirm, that there is not one of them, who ever "mortgaged his effate for more " than it's value, or reduced himfelf near the neceffity of " living by contribution."

THESE are fome of the motives which induced me to acquit you of the fcandal, as I then thought it, of writing this paper. But, upon better information, and farther reflection, I have changed my opinion; and I fee nothing inconfistent with my respect for you, in believing that you did write it.

As great an advantage as it is in all the affairs of life for a man to keep his temper, it is often excufable, and perhaps fometimes even praise-worthy, to lose it. When a minister is contradicted in matters relating to his administration, and when bufy people shall prefume to ask his reasons, instead of fubmitting to his authority, can we wonder if his passion transports him into rhodomontades, and if he behaves himfelf a little wildly? But when the virtue of a minister like you, whose whole life has been one bright example of public and private virtue, shall be suspected, fo far as to be tempted to paffion; who can refuse him even applause, if his generous foul, transported with a just indignation, breathes forth fuch expressions, as might, upon a less occasion, pass for indecent ribaldry?

THIS was your cafe, most noble fir, in the trial which I prefumed lately to make, with too much boldnefs perhaps, but furely with a very good defign. A man writes to you from his his garret, defcribes himfelf as a proftitute fcribbler, and offers you the fervice of his pen: this, and this alone, appears to you; upon which a noble indignation feizes you, and you ftrike boldly, tho' you ftrike in the dark. There is really fomewhat fine in this fally of refentment, and it confirms, in the higheft degree, the fentiments I have long entertained of your integrity, of your ability, and of a certain grace which accompanies and gives a luftre to every part of your conduct.

THE fhare I have had in this adventure, affords me great fatisfaction. Your anger fell on a feigned character, and hurts me not; but the honor of having drawn an anfwer from a first minister, and an answer in print, accrues to me, and is such a one, as the greatest of our weekly authors could never boast.

GIVE me leave therefore to be transported in my turn, but to be transported with joy, and to infert an abstract of your answer in this paper, as BALZAC placed at the head of his works, a letter from the cardinal de RICHLIEU. I confult my own honor, it must be confessed, in doing this; but I confider still more that just applause and admiration which I, with the rest of the world, am obliged on this occasion to give you.

To those parts of the Occasional Writer's letter, which shew that you are at this juncture in want of such fervices as the scoundrel he personated might be fit to do, you make no reply. The want you seem to admit, but the offer of fervice you reject: let the public hear in what manner. Nº III. THE OCCASIONAL WRITER. 173.

ABSTRACT of the M-----r's ANSWER to the Occafional Writer.

Pag. 1. "HOUGH you have not figned your name, "I know you. Becaufe a man who is with-" out all principles of honefty, who in no one thing can be " relied upon, a betrayer of his friend, a traitor to his " prince, an enemy to his country, a perjured, ungrateful, " unfaithful rafeal, must be you; one who is a composition " of all thefe, can be only you.

Pag. 2. "You are an infamous fellow, who make a re-" putation of doing mifchief; and HEROSTRATUS and NEROF " were not greater villains than you.

"You are of fo profligate a character, that in your "profperity no body envied you, and in your difgrace no "body pities you.

"You were in the interest of France, and of the pope, as hath appeared by your writings, and you went out of the way to fave yourfelf from the gallows.

Pag. 3. "You are a fellow who have no conficence at all, "or a damnable complying one : and if you would lend it. "to me, it would be of no use to me.

"You have no abilities; you are an emancipated flave, a proferibed criminal, and an infolvent debtor: and I am not in fuch a defperate forlorn condition, to employ a fellow who hath no talents.

Pag.

Pag. 4. "You have been a traitor, and fhould be ufed "like one. And I love my mafter fo well, that I will "never advife him to ufe you, left you fhould joftle me out " of my employment.

" THE majority are of my opinion. One fide rails at you, the other diflikes you; and that PALINURUS would deferve to be drowned indeed, who let you have the rudder, if he could help it.

" Pag. 5. " I do not value what you or your company fay of me; neither am I to be frighted with a parliamentary fcrutiny. You rail at me, becaufe you envy me; and I defpife all that a man in the impotence of difgrace can do against me, who could never terrify me in the zenith of his power."

Then follow thefe admirable arguments.

Pag. 6, 7, 8. "I. You may talk what you will of France, "Spain, and the emperor, power is fluctuating, and per-"haps I know who is Britain's enemy as well as another. "II. Though we did lend the emperor a helping hand, we "are not to let him do what he pleafes; and when we fet "him up, it was good politics, and now it is equally good "to take him down. III. I do not queftion but we fhall "humble him. IV. I muft tell you plainly, you and I, as "to foreign affairs, differ widely in opinion. V. When our "neighbours grow faucy and encroaching, it is high time to "look about us, and not to be taken napping. VI. I know "you are like the emperor, becaufe he is like yourfelf in "ingratitude; and you hate our friend France, becaufe you "were well received there.

" IF any body fays any thing of me, pray tell them "ALL THESE THINGS. But for all that, I will not give you an employment.

" I know you to be fo hot-headed, that when you have " read this, you will vent all your malice against me. But " I do not value it; for I would rather have you my enemy " than my friend.

" CHANGE your names, and be as abufive and fcurrilous " as you pleafe, I fhall find you out. I am ARISTAEUS; you " are PROTEUS. You may change to a flame, a lion, a bull, " or a bear, I fhall know you, baffle you, conquer you, " and contemn you. All your opposition will redound to " my honor and glory. And fo, fir, I fcorn your proffered " fervices. Sir,

"Your moft, &c."

How great ! how free ! how bold ! how generous ! Well may those who have the honor of a near approach to you, extol the noble openness of your nature, which displays itself in this uncommon manner; and think that temper in a ftatefman truly admirable, which loses itself fo glorioufly. Did ever minister speak fo plainly, or lay himself so open to any man, and especially to such a man as you supposed yourfelf writing to at that time ? Far from discovering hatred and contempt of such wretches, perfons in your fituation have generally encouraged, and even feared them. Nay, they have fometimes as fired to be themselves of that class; and SENECA'S Apocolocynthosis upon CLAUDIUS, is not the fole instance of ministers, who have dipped their pens in fatyr, to rail at the memory of a dead prince.

176. THE OCCASIONAL WRITER. Nº III."

BUT now, after this honorable declaration which you have made, after this great example which you have given, let every mercenary fcribbler, every tool of fecret fervice, tremble and defpair. Long may you live, most noble fir, the just model of a minister, who fearns the assistance of flattery, fallhood, artifice, or corruption.

I HAVE devoted myfelf to your fervice, and fhall certainly attend you through every ftage of your fortune: as long as we both draw vital air, you thall feel the effects of my zeal in your caufe, and I promife you very folemnly, that from henceforward I will live for no other purpofe; fo that I am perfuaded you will hear with pleafure the three engagements which I think it proper to take with the public and with you.

THE first is, that my pen shall constantly preferve decency and good manners, and shall never be stained with any abuse of particular perfons. I will chaftife vice, I will expose folly, and I will combat error, wherever I find them. But I-will never touch upon any unalterable defects in figure, in family, in birth, in any kind whatfoever; much lefs will I allow myfelf to hint at any particular fcandal, or even to mention any real misfortune, which may equally befal the beft and the worft of men; unlefs I am forced by my fubject to it, and unlefs I can foften the evil by the very manner of recalling it to memory. To attack a vice, a folly or an error, is correction. To attack the perfon is defamation. He who writes an invective, does a filly thing, becaufe he lofes his end; and the wifest of men has faid, " he that uttereth flander is a fool." Even truth lofes it's force in an invective, as it does in a panegyric; in one, it is thrown into the lump with malice, in the other, with flattery; and he who is guilty of the first, that is, he who writes against the man, not against his crimes, his his follies, or his errors, feldom proves any thing more than his own envy, and the other's fuperiority. To conclude this head, he, who writes an invective, does a bafe and wicked thing; becaufe his defign is to difturb the quiet, and deftroy the peace of another man, but not to reform him, or to ferve the public. The pen of fuch a writer, like one of those fcourges, of which the profound Meibomius has writ fo learnedly, while it chaftifes the perfon, ferves only to provoke the vice.

Nº III. THE OCCASIONAL WRITER. 177

THE fecond obligation, which I lay myfelf under, and which equally becomes a man who writes in the caufe of truth, is that of intire difintereftednefs.

I KNOW the generofity of your nature, I know what places and penfions have been the rewards of fome very mean performances in verfe and profe; and that R. R. ftate-writer, of whom we are obliged to afk bleffing, is most certainly not at the head of our profeffion. These examples, and a due confideration of the importance of my fervices, teach me fufficiently what expectations I might entertain, without any rifque of a difappointment. But I have neither ambition of this kind, nor avarice. My fortune is above wanting the neceffaries, and my philosophy above wanting the fuperfluities of life. I therefore difcharge you from all obligation of rewarding my fervices; and I wish, for the fake of your eafe, your honor, and your fafety, my example was likely to be followed.

WHEN we behold a great man among a croud of difinterefted friends, we know that they follow his virtues, and his merit; when we hear an orator bring over the majority of an unprejudiced audience to his opinion, we must impute it to the force of his eloquence. But furely it is as Vol. I. A a rare rare for a minifter to have difinterested friends, as an unprejudiced audience; fo that a number of followers can be no proof of his personal virtues, or a majority of his eloquence.

THE antients placed great happiness in their inemptae dapes; I would rather you should place yours in the inempti amici. But alas ! fir, as amiable as you are, this happiness will hardly fall to your lot, in our degenerate age; and I know not whether to maintain your power, you may not be forced to tarnish the lustre of your glorious administration. The king has indeed the hearts of the people; his fervice will always be fupported by a national concurrence; because his views are always directed to the national good. This part is easy and fecure, but when once men come to diftinguish between the king's fervice and yours, there will arife another part not fo eafy nor fecure. You have blended them pretty artfully together hitherto, but I doubt the difcrimination is at hand. When that comes, you will be reduced to a melancholy alternative ; which I beg you to think of, and to prepare for. To quit your power and your pretenfions, and to quit them before you have established in your room that dear brother of yours, who does you fo much fervice at home, by tiring the ****, and the nation fo much honor abroad by diverting the C*** of F***, would indeed be hard. But on the other hand, be pleafed to confider that this nation has gone very far into corruption already; that there is a point of corruption, to which no nation can arrive and recover their liberties, if they are loft; or even preferve them, if they are not loft, according to MA-CHIAVEL's obfervation; and that whoever is the inftrument of plunging his country irretrievably into this abyfs, I use a word you feem fond of, will fall into a terrible abyfs himfelf, and have no fuperiority any where, but where the briber briber stands before the bribed, as the devil stands before the finner.

You fee, fir, how my zeal transports me, and carries me upon the least hint, which may be improved to your honor or fervice, even out of my subject. I return to it, and the third engagement which I take, is to observe a strict impartiality.

To do otherwife, would be to act contrary to my nature, and to the dictates of my reafon. I have a natural abhorrence of injuffice; and I confidered, when I first drew my pen, in how particular a manner it behoves us political writers to be on our guard, against falling into any partia-lity. The judge is circumscribed by forms, to the observance of which he is bound; he has the law open before him; the parties, on whom he fits in judgment are generally indifferent to him, and far from having any of his paffions awakened, the whole man is fometimes prone to fleep. When there is room to fufpect a judge of partiality in a par-ticular cafe, it is agreeable to the practice of fome countries that he fhould decline prefiding at the trial, or be obliged to withdraw at the requisition of the party. With all thefe, and many other precautions which wife conftitutions have established, it is neither easy nor fafe for the venerable fages of the law to exercife partiality. But we political writers are not under the fame reftraints, and are exposed to ftrong temptations. No forms are prefcribed to regulate our proceedings; no particular laws adapted to the particular cafes which may occur, lie open before us. The general law of reason is the only rule we have to follow; the application of this rule requires the most nice exactness, and we are obliged to make this application often, in pronouncing judgment on men and things, when we are the most warmly engaged in Aa 2 thofe those civil contests, which the duty of our profession exposes us to, and even when our tempers are ruffled by opposition. From which confideration, the difficulty of preferving a strict impartiality may evidently appear : give me leave, however, to illustrate this matter a little farther.

In the Athenian commonwealth, the citizen who took no fide was deemed indifferent to the public good, and was branded for his infamous neutrality. Now, if fuch an obligation as this lay upon every private citizen in that democratical government, it is certain, that we public perfons, at least, ought to think ourfelves under the fame obligation, even in this limited monarchy of ours. Indifference must be a crime in us, to be ranked but one degree below treachery; for deferting the commonwealth is next to betraying it. Our duty must oblige us in all public disputes to take the best fide, and to efpouse it with warmth : this warmth will beget warmth; for you know, fir, that the worft fide is not always the worft defended. Provocations will multiply daily, and we may be attacked in the most fensible parts. You, fir, yourfelf, may for aught I know be infulted, and your fpotlefs character may be defiled by fome faucy fcribbler : in this licentious age, nothing is held facred; under the specious pretence of free-thinking, the providence, and the very being of Gop, have been openly called in question, and reflections on your administration may possibly steal into the world.

SUPPOSE, for a moment, that any thing fo monftrous as this fhould happen, that you fhould be directly inveighed againft, or which perhaps is more poignant, ironically commended; and then confider how difficult it would be for a profeffed admirer of you, heated in the conteft, to keep his temper, and to preferve his impartiality: you must agree with me, the tafk would be extremely difficult.

Nº III. THE OCCASIONAL WRITER. 181

But I am fure you will agree likewife, that as difficult as it would be, a confcientious man ought to impose it upon himfelf.

THE ill effects of partiality in us political writers, when it carries us to give unjuft and falfe reprefentations of men and things, will not be thought of little moment by you, who labor for fame, and expect a great part of your reward from pofterity, as pofterity is to receive a great part of the advantages which your wife and virtuous administration procures, in " reviving, fupporting, and extending credit, in " opening fo comfortable a prospect of the payment of our " debts, in ftrengthening us abroad by fo many beneficial " alliances, and above all in amending our morals, by the " total difcouragement of every kind of artifice and corrup-" tion."

THE civil magiftrate may give away a man's effate, or take away his life; but we can do, and often have done more; we fet the general characters and particular actions of men in what light we pleafe, and deliver them down, fometimes very unjuftly, under the most amiable or the most hateful colors to future ages: for the rash fentence we pronounce is eagerly received, and as eagerly transmitted by those who are animated with the same passion.

In this manner are unjuft, and even falle reprefentations eftablifhed. They become the general opinion of mankind, and then, altho' our works fhould grow out of date as faft as a Gazette, which it muft be confeffed happens very frequently: yet ftill the mifchief is done, the hiftorian perpetuates the flander which the politician broached, and triumphs in the cotemporary authority, upon which he writes to ferve the prefent turn, or to fatisfy refentment of party; fuch 3 perfons as have no other crime but that of differing in opinion from us, and fuch events as have no other demerit but our diflike of the perfons who bring them about, are loaded with infamy. Posterity is imposed upon as well as the prefent age, and the children continue the fathers vengeance, without having the fathers provocation.

THIS faint fketch of fome confequences that follow the partiality of political writers, and of the danger wherein we all ftand of being transported by our own passions, or hurried by those of other people, fo far to be answerable for fuch confequences, may fuffice to shew how much reason there is for a man who undertakes the career I am entering upon, to be watchful over himself, and to lay himself under as strong a restraint as I do by this following engagement.

INDEED, as the world goes, it is only by running into extremes that a flate-writer can effectually pleafe his party, or ferve himfelf; the eye of party fees nothing but quite white, or quite black, obferves no degrees between them, and can diftinguifh no middle color that partakes of both. The greateft genius in writing may be expofed to fhare the fate of the greateft genie in painting. ANNIBAL CARACHE, who followed nature and truth with the utmoft exactnefs, found his nobleft works difcountenanced and neglected. He thereupon advifed GUIDO and CARAVAGIO, his two favorite fcholars, to take quite another manner, to trace nothing faithfully, but to outrage all they reprefented, the one by painting in the darkeft, and the other in the lighteft manner. By thefe means both of them were fure of admirers, and both of them grew rich.

Nº III. THE OCCASIONAL WRITER. 183

no matter. Their principle is to lay their colors on thick, and to be equally in an extreme. But I hope, for my own part, to prove that I am not of this number. On the contrary, I will endeavor to excel in a much more difficult way, in foftenings and middle teints; and yet by thefe to form a manner fo ftrong, as fhall be fufficient for my own reputation, and for your fervice. To you, who have fo fine a tafte in painting, this attempt will, I flatter myfelf, be agreeable, and will fecure the continuance of your favor to,

In HOC SIGNO vinces.

AVING as yet given the reader little befides grave difcourfes on public matters, and forefeeing that, during the feffion of parliament, I fhall be obliged to continue daily in the fame track, I am willing to take this one opportunity of prefenting him with fomething, which has no relation at all to public affairs, but is of a nature purely amufing, and entirely void of reflection upon any perfon whatfoever.

My friend ALVAREZ (a man not unknown to many here, by his frequent journies to England) did fome time fince make me a prefent of a Perfian manufcript, which he met with while he followed the fortunes of MERIWEIS. An exact translation of the first chapter has been made, at my request, by the learned Mr. SOLOMON NEGRI, and is as follows:

CAMILICK'S VISION.

I N the name of God, ever merciful, and of HALY his pro-phet. I flept in the plains of Bagdad, and I dreamed a dream. I lifted my eyes, and I faw a vast field, pitched with the tents of the mighty, and the ftrong ones of the earth in array of battle. I observed the arms and enfigns of either hoft. In the banners of the one were pictured a crown and scepter; and upon the shields of the soldiers were engraven fcourges, chains, iron maces, axes, and all kinds of inftruments of violence. The standards of the other bore the crown and fcepter alfo; but the devices on the fhields were the balance, the olive wreath, the plough-fhare, and other emblematical figures of juffice, peace, law, and liberty. Between these two armies I faw a king come forth, and fign a large roll of parchment; at which loud fhouts of acclamation were heard from every quarter. The roll itself flew up into the air, and appeared over their heads, encompassed with rays of glory. I obferved that where ever the fecond army moved, this glorious apparition attended them; or rather the army feemed only to move, as that guided or directed. Soon after, I faw both these hosts engaged, and the whole face of the land overfpread with blood. I faw the king who had figned and broken that facred charter, drink out of a golden cup, fall into convultions, gafp and die.

I THEN faw another king take his place; who, in the moft folemn manner, engaged to make the words contained in the roll the guide of his actions; but notwithftanding this, I faw both armies again encounter. I faw the king a prifoner. I faw his fon relieve him, and I faw the chiefs of the other army put to death. Yet that victorious fon himfelf bowed his head to the parchment; which now appeared with fuller Vol. I. B b lustre than before. Several other battles ensued, with vast flaughter on both fides; during which the celeftial volume was fometimes clouded over; but still again exerted its rays, and after every cloud appeared the brighter. I observed those heroes, who fought beneath it, though ever fo unfortunate, not once to abate their courage, while they had the least glimpse of that heavenly apparition in their view; and even those, whom I faw overthrown, pierced with ghaftly wounds, and panting in death, refigned their lives in fmiles, and with eyes caft up to that glorious object. At laft the long contention ceafed. I beheld both armies unite and move together under the fame influence. I faw one king twelve times bow down before the bright phænomenon, which from thence forward fpread a light over the whole land; and, defcending nearer to the earth, the beams of it grew fo warm as it approached, that the hearts of the inhabitants leaped for joy. The face of war was no more. The fame fields, which had fo long been the scene of death and defolation, were now covered with golden harvefts. The hills were cloathed with fheep. The woods fung with gladnefs. Plenty laughed in the valleys. Industry, commerce, and liberty danced hand in hand through the cities.

WHILE I was delighting myfelf with this amiable profpect, the fcene entirely changed. The fields and armies vanifhed; and I faw a large and magnificent hall, refembling the great divan or council of the nation. At the upper end of it, under a canopy, I beheld the facred covenant, fhining as the fun. The nobles of the land were there affembled. They proftrated themfelves before it, and they fung an hymn. " Let the heart of the king be glad; for his people are " happy! May the light of the covenant be a lanthorn to " the feet of the judges; for by this fhall they feparate " truth from falfhood. O innocence, rejoice! for by this " light " light fhalt thou walk in fafety; nor fhall the oppreffor take hold on thee. O juffice, be exceeding glad ! for by this light all thy judgments fhall be decreed with wifdom; nor fhall any man fay thou haft erred. Let the hearts of all the people be glad ! for this have their grandfathers died; in this have their fathers rejoiced; and in this may their pofterity rejoice evermore !"

THEN all the rulers took a folemn oath to preferve it inviolate and unchanged, and to facrifice their lives and their fortunes, rather than fuffer themfelves or their children to be deprived of fo invaluable a bleffing.

AFTER this, I faw another and larger affembly come forward into the hall, and join the first. These paid the same adorations to the covenant; took the fame oath; they fung the fame hymn; and added a folemn form of imprecation to this effect. " Let the words of the roll be for ever in our " eyes, and graven on our hearts; and accurfed be he who " layeth hands on the fame. Accurfed be he, who fhall " remove this writing from the people; or who shall hide " the law thereof from the king. Let that man be cut off " from the earth. Let his riches be fcattered as the dust. " Let his wife be the wife of the people. Let not his first-born be ranked among the nobles. Let his palaces be " deftroyed. Let his gardens be as a defart, having no " water. Let his horfes and his horfemen be overthrown; " and let his dogs devour their carcafes." --- In the midft of thefe execrations entered a man, dreffed in a plain habit, with a purfe of gold in his hand. He threw himfelf forward into the room, in a bluff, ruffianly manner. A fmile, or rather a fneer, fat on his countenance. His face was bronzed over with a glare of confidence. An arch malignity leered in his eye. Nothing was fo extraordinary as the effect of Bb 2 this this perfon's appearance. They no fooner faw him, but they all turned their faces from the canopy, and fell proftrate before him. He trod over their backs, without any ceremony, and marched directly up to the throne. He opened his purfe of gold, which he took out in handfuls, and fcattered amongft the affembly. While the greater part were engaged in fcrambling for these pieces, he seized, to my inexpressible furprize, without the least fear, upon the facred parchment itfelf. He rumpled it rudely up, and crammed it into his pocket. Some of the people began to murmur. He threw more gold, and they were pacified. No fooner was the parchment taken away, but in an inftant I faw half the august affembly in chains. Nothing was heard through the whole divan, but the noise of fetters, and clank of irons. I faw pontiffs in their ecclefiaftical habits, and fenators clad in ermine, linked together like the most ignominious flaves. Terror and amazement were imprefied on every countenance, except on that of fome few to whom the man continued difperfing his gold. This he did till his purfe became empty. Then he dropt it: but then too, in the very fame moment, he himfelf dropt with it to the ground. That, and the date of his power, at once expired. He funk, and funk for ever. The radiant volume again arofe; again shone out, and reaffumed its place above the throne; the throne, which had been darkened all this time, was now filled with the effulgence of the glory which darted from it. Every chain dropped off in an inftant. Every face regained its former chearfulnefs. Heaven and earth refounded with liberty! liberty ! and the HEART OF THE KING WAS GLAD WITHIN HIM.

LONDON JOURNAL* of Saturday, December 21, 1728.

HE family of the PUBLICOLÆ are furely very numerous. I pretend to no acquaintance with them, and I defire none. Far be it from me therefore to affign to any one of the fraternity his particular lucubration. I do not prefume to fay, for inftance, that fuch a piece was writ by BEN, or fuch a one by ROBIN; but I can plainly diftinguifh, in their productions, a difference of ftyle and character. In fome, I feel myfelf lulled by a regular, mild, and frequently languid harangue; fuch as often defcends upon us from the pulpit. In others, I obferve a crude, incoherent, rough, inaccurate, but fometimes fprightly declamation; well enough fitted for popular affemblies, where the majority is already convinced.

The PUBLICOLA of the feventh of December quite jaded me. I handled the numb fifth till I fancied a torpor feized my imagination; and perhaps you may think, that I am hardly yet recovered from the confequences of that accident. However, I fhall venture to play a little with the PUBLICOLA of this day; for I think I can go through an answer to his paper. He returns the ball at least, and keeps up the game.

BEFORE I come to this, give me leave to premife a word or two more.

As different as the PUBLICOLÆ are in other things, in one they are all alike. They are fcurrilous and impatient. They call names, and grow angry at a fneer. RALEIGH laid down his pen, rather than continue fuch a bear-garden conteft. I took it up and anfwered them for once in their own ftyle; but they muft not expect fo much complaifance from me any more. The matters we enter upon are ferious, and by me they fhall be treated ferioufly and calmly. I fhall confider the dignity of the caufe I plead for; the caufe of truth; the caufe of my country; and I fhall look down with contempt on the invectives and menaces, which they may throw out; and by which they will fuit their ftyle with great propriety to their fubject.---But let us come to the point.

THE PUBLICOLA of this day fet outs with flating, in an half light, a queftion which hath been much debated in the world. No man that I know of, no reafonable man I am fure, did ever find fault that we avoided a war. Our national circumflances are fo well known, they are fo feverely felt, that minifters who maintained peace, and procured to their country the bleffings of peace, quiet, improvement of trade, diminution of taxes, decreafe of debts, would be almoft the objects of public adoration. But the exception taken to our conduct hath been this; that we provoked a war firft, and fhewed a fear of it afterwards. People recal the paffages of three years paft. They wifh we had practifed greater caution at that time; but then the fame people very confiftently wifh that we had exerted greater vigor fince. If the honor and interest of his late majesty, and of the British nation, fay they, were fo feverely wounded by the public or private treaties of Vienna, that it was fit to keep no longer any meafures, even fuch as have been thought of decency, with the emperor and the king of Spain; why this fear of difobliging them? Why this long forbearance under all the infults offered to us by the Spaniards? If we were in a condition, by our own ftrength, and by our alliance with France, to enter with a prospect of fuccess into an immediate war; why again have we chofen to defer it, under fo many provocations to begin it? Why have we endured fome of the worft confequences of a war, without taking those advantages which acting offenfively would undeniably have procured to us? But if all this was quite otherwife, continue the fame political reafoners; if the honor and interest of his late majefty, and of the British nation, were not fo feverely wounded; if we were neither, by our own ftrength, nor by the alliance of France, in a condition to rifque a war; nay more, if things were fo unfortunately jumbled, that perhaps " this war would have been more to our own detriment than " to that of our enemies," as the PUBLICOLAE have more than once infinuated in their papers, what could we mean three years ago, when matters were carried to greater and harfher extremities than it is possible to find any example of among civilized nations, fince the quarrels of CHARLES the fifth, and FRANCIS the first? If our "principal ally would have " been dangerous to our interests in the operations of a war, " and is indifferent to them in the negotiations of peace," for this hath been infinuated too from the fame quarter, what a treaty was that which procured us this ally? What affurances were those which made us depend upon him? The difficulty of these dilemmas cannot, I think, be folved; and those who attempt it deceive themselves, whilst they mean to deceive the people.

BUT we are told that we went into a war, as far as the reason of things would give us leave. It feems then that the reason of things would neither give us leave to protect our trade, nor to make reprizals, when our merchants were plundered. If these words are to pass for any thing more than empty found, it will follow either that PUBLICOLA is capable of affirming the grofieft untruth in a paper, addreffed to the people of England; or that our fituation is worfe than the least fanguine of our friends ever thought it, or the most malicious of our enemies ever reprefented it. Very bad indeed must it be, if the reason of things obliged us to bear from the Spaniards, at this low ebb of their maritime power, what would not have been borne when their proud armada covered the feas; what would hardly have been borne, even in the reign of king JAMES the first.

BUT, GOD be praifed! this is not our cafe; and therefore PUBLICOLA must be content to lie under the imputation which he hath drawn on himfelf by the boldnefs of his affertions.

HE is frequently guilty of this fault; and the words which immediately follow those I-have quoted, afford a ftrong instance of it. "We did not, fays he, take the galleons and " bring them home; but we blocked them up; which as " completely answered the true end and defign of fending " that fleet, as the actual taking of them. The defign was " to keep the money out of their hands (the Spaniards) and fo " difable them to carry on the project of the treaty of Vienna." Very well. This matter is brought to a fhort iffue. The blockade of the galleons is over. Our fleet is come back from the West-Indies. The galleon's are either come or coming. The Spaniards therefore are, according to PUBLICOLA, no longer difabled from carrying on the project of the Vienna treaty.

treaty. I ask then, have they abandoned, have they renounced these projects? If our fleet blocked up the galleons till this was done, he is in the right. This answered the design of sending it. If they should, after this, break their faith, and renounce the most facred obligations, none but they are to be complained of.

PUBLICOLA would have us believe, indeed, that they have renounced these projects; that they have granted us the main things in dispute; and that the congress is only to fettle other affairs of less importance. But this I deny; and he shall be obliged to confess either that he advances, here again, a bold untruth; or that he reckons our keeping Gibraltar not amongst the main things in dispute, but amongst those of less importance. Let him shew me, if he can, in the preliminaries, a particular and express confirmation of our right to this place, made by the Spaniards. I will undertake to shew him the general words, by which the Spaniards will pretend in the congress, as it is notorious they do every where and on all occasions, that they have still a right to demand the restitution of Gibraltar, and that this right is to be discussed in the congress.

I KNOW it hath been faid more than once, in a very public place, and in a very folemn manner, that Gibraltar fhould not be even mentioned at the congrefs; but it would be impertinent to lay any ftrefs on the affurances of a perfon, who hath prefumed to give fo many groundlefs ones already; and who either hath been bantered moft egregioufly himfelf, or hath made no fcruple of bantering his country.

HERE then is one main point of our interests, to mention no more, still unsettled; not because the Spaniards have flown off from any agreement they had come to with us about it; Vol. I. C c but but becaufe it was never fettled; and yet the galleons are left at liberty to come home.

IF afferting our right to Gibraltar, and fome other things, which were founded fo high by an acquaintance of yours, Mr. PUBLICOLA (the author of the Enquiry) had no fhare in the ends which were proposed by fending our fleet to the West-Indies, such strange incomprehensible ends may, for aught I know, have been completely answered : but if these points, so effential to Great Britain, were any of the main things in dispute; if they were any of the ends proposed by what is called distressing the Spaniards; then is it false to affert that these ends have been completely answered.

WHEN we confider what numbers of able and useful fubjects his majefty hath loft in the expedition to the Weft-Indies; and that we are, at leaft, as far off from a fettlement of interests with Spain now, as we were before that expedition was undertaken, it is impossible not to feel great and unaffected concern.

IF it be afked, what was to be done? I shall answer that, perhaps, it little becomes a private man to determine such great questions; but I will proceed to shew that all which PUBLICOLA advances against taking the galleons, is triffing.

FIRST then, if blocking up the galleons in the Spanish ports was of fuch confequence, taking them would have been a more effectual measure to all the same purposes.

SECONDLY, if we had taken them, as it is certain that Mr. HOSIER could have done with eafe, and with all their treafure on beard, immediately on his first arrival, we should have had a chance a chance the more for taking the flota too, which ftole away to Europe, whilft our fquadron lay rotting before Porto-Bello.

THIRDLY, if we had taken this treafure, we fhould have had in our hands a fufficient fecurity for indemnifying our merchants, who have been the only fufferers, by the depredations of the Spaniards, whilft the French and Dutch have failed fecurely; and to one body of whom, I mean the South-Sea company, the king of Spain owes, for former feizures unjuftly made, as much perhaps as his proportion in the treafure of the galleons amounts to.

FOURTHLY, to have taken the galleons would not have been liable to the fame inconveniencies, as we have feverely felt by purfuing another measure. The expedition would have been foon over. The expence of lives and treasure would have been infinitely lefs. It would have coft little or nothing to have kept the Spaniards out of their money by a feizure, as long as the true reason of things should have required it; whereas it hath coft us more than all that money is worth, to keep them out of it by a blockade only for a time; and for a time, which hath not been fufficient to fecure us against their defigns, or to make them lay afide their pretenfions. "But if we had taken " them, fays PUBLICOLA, we fhould have taken the money of " other people, as well as of the Spaniards. We should have " been pyrates." Let us fee how this hangs together. If we had reftored immediately to the proprietors their respective shares, as he supposes we must have done, the brand of pyracy would not have fluck upon us. But fuppofe we had thought fit not to reftore their shares to the Spaniards, till our differences with the court of Madrid had been fettled ; fhould we have been pyrates in that cafe ? He will be laughed at who affirms it. Would the king of Spain's share in this treasure have Cc 2 have been no loss to him? would he not have miffed the extravagant indulto, which he is now going to receive on this immense treasure? Should we have been pyrates for punishing, in this manner, a prince, who actually besieged one of our fortress, who actually detained the ships and feized the estates of our merchants, and whose subjects every day killed, robbed and plundered the subjects of Great Britain?

BUT I go a step farther; for if we stop with PUBLICOLA; it will be always short of the mark, and we shall never exhaust the subject, as I defire to do, because I defire to find the truth, and to be fure that I find it. What hath been faid hitherto, hath been faid on the supposition of a feizure only; and I hope the fcruples of PUBLICOLA's timorous confcience are appeafed. I hope he hath found out, by this time, that fuch a feizure might have been carried on without pyracy. But suppose it had been a capture, not a feizure; fuch a capture as can never be made but in time of open war; fuch a capture as intitles the captors, by our laws, to the whole profit of the prize. Why then we had commenced a war against Spain by this action, as Spain had done long before against us by a thousand hostilities. Why then vice-admiral Hosser, and the officers and seamen of his fquadron, had been in the fame cafe as Sir CHARLES WA-GER, and the officers and feamen of his fquadron were in the last war; and I do not remember that these gallant men were ever profecuted as pyrates at home; or reputed fuch abroad, or obliged to refund any part of the treafure they had taken.

UPON the whole matter, PUBLICOLA's argument proves nothing in the prefent cafe; or it proves that even when we are at war with Spain, we must not prefume to attack these facred gallcons. Other nations are always interested in them, as well well as the Spaniards. It will therefore be always unlawful, according to this excellent cafuift, to make prize of them : and he is defied to diftinguish himself out of this absurdity.

HAVING now gone through what Mr. PUBLICOLA calls, I know not why, the fubject in general, we will examine the fecond part of his epiftle. I pass over all the Billingsgate with which he ushers in this part; tho' I could make my-felf and you too very merry, if I would apply his criticisms on what RALEIGH fays, concerning one promife, to the interpretation which was given to another promife; by which we might have learned, amongst many other curious distinctions, the difference between a direct promise and a promise ministerially worded : but I shall leave him to his phrenzy, and proceed foberly to fhew you that he fays nothing, or that which is worfe than nothing, in every line of this performance; in which he feems to triumph with fuch vaft complacency.

THE point he labors is to fhew that the promife made by the lord STANHOPE to reftore Gibraltar, which hath not been complied with, and the deftruction of the Spanish fleet on the coaft of "Sicily, threw the court of Madrid into the arms of " the emperor, and were the true root and real caufe of all that " thorough hatred and deep malice fhewn in the treaty of " Vienna;" and by confequence that all our prefent difficulties with Spain proceed from hence; from caufes laid many years ago, and when the prefent ministers were not in power. My bufiness shall not be to blame or to excuse any ministers ; but to make a true deduction of facts, and to reason clearly and juftly upon them; and I charitably hope, that I may bring PUBLICOLA to do fo in time ; if for no other reason, at least by obliging him to take fhame to himfelf fo often : for tho' I ame not fo bloody-minded as PUBLICOLA, who talks as if he had heads 3 heads in his power, yet I affure him, that I will not let him alone whilft, amongft other enormities, he makes it his bufinefs to bury truth and common fenfe under fuch weekly heaps of rubbifh.

I SHALL fhew immediately that, in whatever terms or manner we fuppofe lord STANHOPE to have made a promife of reftoring Gibraltar to the Spaniards, it will be of no avail to PUBLICOLA'S purpofe. But fince he hath told us what he hath heard, and RALEIGH hath told us what he hath heard, for neither of them can pretend to fpeak on their own knowledge concerning this affair, I will likewife take leave to flate what I have been informed of, upon better authority than what my adverfary hath often writ upon in his affirmative ftyle.

I HAVE been informed then, that lord STANHOPE had been induced, or feduced, call it which you pleafe, by the late regent of France, to make an overture of this kind at the court of Madrid. Lord STANHOPE, fays our author, might think that Gibraltar was to be "honeftly given up for " valuable confiderations." He might fo; and he was fo honeft a man, fo fincere a lover of his country, that if he had thought in another manner, no confideration of private interest, no regard to the fervice of a ministry; could have prevailed on him to make, nor even to entertain the motion. But have a care of your infinuations, Mr. PUBLICOLA; and learn to make them with a little more delicacy. The cafe is vaftly different now. The fense of our august monarch is known. The sense of the whole nation hath been loudly proclaimed; and I believe no minister, how prefuming soever, will venture, at this time, to fay that Gibraltar may be honorably or advantageoufly given up; and therefore no virtuous minister will think he can honeftly give it up, or confpire in measures which which may create the appearance of a neceffity fo to do.---But to return to my narration.

IF fuch an overture was made by lord STANHOPE, it was made to prevail on the court of Spain to defift from the enterprize they had then in hand; an enterprize, which we fhould have been obliged to prevent, if the treaty of quadruple alliance had never been made, by virtue of our guaranty to the neutrality of Italy. That this overture was not received is evident; fince the Spaniards went on with their expedition, which ended in the deftruction of their fleet. Now call this an overture, as I do; or call it a promife, as PUBLICOLA will affect to do; it was vacated to all intents and purpofes by the Spaniards, who refufed to comply with the condition on which it was and only could be grounded.

IT hath been faid by fome, that this promife was renewed afterwards, to pacify the Spaniards for the lofs of their fhips, and for their defeat in Sicily: but this deferves explanation; and will not ftand in the light which those who urge it defire it fhould.

It is, I believe, true, that the French, who first induced us to make this overture, would, on the pretences just now mentioned, and on the pretence of the hopes which the regent had continued to give the Spaniards, have obliged us to acknowledge this vacated promife as a fubfisting obligation; but I have been informed, that this was refused flatly to the minister fent over hither upon that occasion, and to the regent himself by our minister abroad. The promife then continued vacated ; and we were as much difentangled from the fnares which our good allies laid for us, as if no fuch promife or overture had been ever made.

Bur farther. If a promife of this kind had been made on our part, even after the expedition to Sicily, which there is no color to affirm, yet that promife must likewife have been void, fince it was made fo, to all intents and purposes, by the king of Spain's acceffion to the * quadruple alliance.

THAT all poffeffions are mutually confirmed by that treaty, except fuch as are fpecified in it, cannot be denied. The poffeffion of Gibraltar was therefore again confirmed to us by the king of Spain, when he acceded to that treaty; unlefs he can fhew that our poffeffion of it was excepted, or can produce any private article or declaration, which made a refervation of his right to this place, notwithftanding the ceffion of it made at Utrecht. But nothing of this can be fhewn; and it hath been faid, I believe truly, that a contrary declaration was made folemnly and publicly by the Britifh minifter in Holland, at the very time when the acceffion was figned.

THUS far then the way is clear before us. When we came mediators to the congress of Cambray (for fuch we were at that place, tho' we have the misfortune to find ourfelves principally and almost folely concerned in the disputes to be fettled at Soiffons) the king of Spain had no right, nor pretence of right to demand of Great Britain the reftitution of Gibraltar. Indeed, if he had then fuch a pretence; if a promise, on our part, to reftore this place to him, which promise we refused to execute, had then substituted, how could he have accepted of our mediation?

Av, but (fays this poor hunted author, who doubles and fhifts and works and tries, at any rate, to fave himfelf) lord

* Vide the treaty.

STANHOPE, according to RALEIGH'S own confession, was first in this affair, and laid the foundation of this expectation in the Spaniards.----It is plain the Spaniards had fuch affurances. It is allowed you, at least for argument fake, that lord STAN-HOPE was first in this affair. The Spaniards had fuch affurances. Make your most of it. These affurances were difcharged. These promises were released; and whatever lord STANHOPE can be supposed to have done or faid about Gibraltar, hath no more relation to the present dispute, than what was done or faid about Gibraltar in the time of king Ro-DRIGUE and the count JULIAN: fo that our author is building up a right for the Spaniards upon foundations which were demoliss of this nature, without establishing a right, real or plausible, is too frivolous to deferve an answer.

LET me illuftrate this by a familiar inftance; for things cannot be made too plain to him. I will fuppofe him a clergyman. I will fuppofe that by merit, of fome kind or other, he gets a promife of a bifhoprick. After this, he does fomething inconfiftent with fuch a promotion. He forfeits all title. He renounces all pretenfions to it. Shall his advocate be admitted to infift that, notwithftanding all this, he expects to be a bifhop ftill; and, inftead of grounding his expectations on his right, ground his right on his expectations; No certainly; fuch an advocate would be hiffed out of court, and would deferve at leaft to have his gown pulled over his ears.

But the Spaniards are not fo chimerical. They ground their expectations, and what they call their right, on a new engagement taken by us, as they fay, fince all the tranfactions, mentioned above, were over; on a private article, Vol. I. D d in in a treaty made with them in 1721, ftipulating the contents of a letter to be written by the late king; and on the letter, written in purfuance of this article, the original of which they offer to produce; and which they pretend to be a positive engagement to reflore Gibraltar to them.

WITH what front now could PUBLICOLA affirm, that what RALEIGH fays about the letter is nothing to his purpofe; unlefs this myfterious letter had been wrote before this fame kind of a verbal promife was made?----If this myfterious or minifterial letter had been writ before lord STANHOPE's promife was made, it would have been nothing to RALEIGH's purpofe; becaufe his purpofe was to fhew, that the demand which the Spaniards now make of Gibraltar, cannot be made on any thing which paffed in lord STANHOPE's time; but it was extremely to his purpofe to fhew that this letter was writ after lord STANHOPE's death. Had PUBLICOLA taken upon him to ridicule the plaineft and eafieft demonftration in EUCLID, he could not have rendered himfelf more ridiculous than he does upon this occafion.

I AM at a lofs what words to ufc. I have debarred myfelf from ufing hard ones; and none but the hardeft are equal to what this writer deferves. Let him pass then without any animadversion from me. Let the reader pronounce fentence upon him.

San Barris

To fum up the whole on this head. PUBLICOLA was to prove that my lord STANHOPE's promife to reftore Gibraltar, is one of the reafons of the prefent obftinacy of the Spaniards, and by confequence of our prefent difficulties. Now it is notorious that in fact the Spaniards ground their demand on fomething which paffed whilft he was alive. PUBLICOLA fays, it never appeared that the prefent miniftry came into 7 fuch affurances. If he means the affurances given by my lord STANHOPE, and long ago made null, he is most certainly in the right, for a very obvious reason. But if he means the affurances still infisted upon, I have nothing to fay but this. These affurances, or what the Spaniards call by that name, were given in the year of our Lord 1721.

THE fecond reason assigned, by this profound politician, for the obstinacy of the Spaniards, is the refentment which hath lain at their hearts, ever fince we destroyed their fleet. Here are no proofs offered; nor can there be any, which are direct; becaufe the affertion relates to what paffes, and hath passed these many years, in the hearts of the king, queen and ministers of Spain. It is a fact, which we are to take on the bare word of this author, or to reject. I make no fcruple of rejecting it, because the probable reasons against it feem to me of much greater weight than his fingle authority in any cafe, and especially in a case of this nature. The Spaniards were certainly not very well pleafed with us for deftroying their fleet. But doth it follow from hence, that the refentment which they conceived upon this occasion, operates thus ftrongly still? How often were the French beaten by us in the last war? Were not whole squadrons of their ships destroyed? How many of their armies were defeated ? How many of their towns were taken ? Notwithftanding which, we fee with pleafure, the most perfect harmony, the most intimate friendship, subsist between their court and ours; even from the time, when their difgraces were recent, and when their refentments against us must have run the higheft, if it was true that refentment, and not the Ragione di Stato, as the Italians call it, governed the conduct of princes. But the Spaniards are more vindictive than the French. This may be faid perhaps by people, who are apt to support one affirmation by another, and to call Dd 2 that . .

that proof. But then how came it to pass, that the Spaniards were fo foon reconciled to the French, and entered into fuch clofe alliances with them immediately after the campaign of 1718? If the British arms beat the Spanish fleet, the French arms took the Spanish towns at the same time. The near relation, and the antient friendship between the two courts of France and Spain, it may be faid again, rendered their reconciliation eafy. But this would be to suppose what isquite contrary to the natural course of human passions. According to that, the court of Spain must have been infinitely more piqued against their own family, for joining in oppofition to them with the emperor, who had been fo long their common enemy, than against the court of Britain, who had not the fame ties to them, and who acted for an old ally. This is natural and probable. Nay, when we confider how many marks of the utmost refentment were shewn at that: time by the Spanish to the French court; how many intrigues the former carried on to fubvert the government, and to raife a rebellion in France; I think we may juftify affirming that this is true in fact. And yet how foon was: all this forgot at Madrid ? How foon was the reunion of the two courts brought about in the clofeft manner, and cemented by marriages?

THE king and queen of Spain might look on the proceedings of the French, in this affair, as a political quarrel, and a national wrong; but they looked on an affair, which happened a few years afterwards, as a perfonal injury and affront. I mean the fending back the infanta in fo abrupt, fo unpropared a manner, without any foftening, and with fo many aggravating circumflances. Never refentment run higher, nor was expressed in terms of greater passion, than that of the court of Madrid upon this occasion; and yet one or two facrifices, a little address, and a little management pacified all; all; united the two courts again; and reftored to the French, in a fhort time, fuch an influence in Spain, that it is marvellous we, who depend fo much upon it, fhould not yet have found the leaft effect from it in our favor.

I HAVE dwelt on these observations, in order to shew to what poor expedients those writers are reduced, who attribute the prefent obstinacy of the Spaniards to the beating. their fleet above nine years ago. Surely it is ftrange that the cardinal DE FLEURY should have been able, in feven or eight months time, to re-establish a good correspondence and friendship between the two courts of France and Spain, after fo great and fo fenfible an affront as PHILIP and his queen thought was put upon them by his predeceffor in the ministry; and that our ministers should not be able, in the course of as many years, to atone for what their predeceffors did ; nor to pacify the refentment of the Spaniards, for their lofs of the fleet in an action, which they might have avoided; and which they rendered, in fome fort, unavoidable to us. It is impossible to believe, that fuch an incident should produce these effects; which seem to strengthen, rather than. to grow weaker, the farther they are removed from this supposed cause of them. There must be something more recent than this anger, at a lofs long fince fuffained and. repaired too, as I believe. Perhaps we may begin to make fome difcovery of this kind, when we examine the next article; to which I shall proceed as foon as I have made a few reflections more on this head, which PUBLICOLA most prudently fuggefts to me, and which will be of wonderful. fervice to his caufe.

"Nor does the quadruple alliance" (fays he; but he muft mean the king of Spain's acceffion to this alliance) " being " being after the promife" (that is, lord STANHOPE's pro-mife or overture, concerning Gibraltar) " prove the Spaniards. " had given up their expectations founded on that promife; " but only that they were not, at that time, in proper cir-cumftances to infift upon it." I have flewn how filly it is to talk of expectations, without any right to expect; and how the right of the Spaniards to Gibraltar, acquired by lord STANHOPE's promise, or overture, either real or supposed, was extinguished before the year 1721. But I agree, that if they had then had even a real right, they must have fubmitted to give it up, as they did at that time, because of the circumstances into which they were fallen. Let me ask Mr. PUBLICOLA what reduced them to these circumstances? He must answer, it was beating their fleet. They had been as obftinate before that time as it is poslible for them to be now. ALBERONI talked at leaft as high as the marquis DE LA PAZ. But they grew complying as foon as this hoftility was committed. Might not the taking their galleons have had the fame effect lately? Would not our incomparable ministers, who run up and down the world negotiating and making treaties, with fo much credit to themfelves, and fo much honor and advantage to the nation, have done better (I speak it with due submission to their approved wisdom) to imitate than to blame the conduct of their predecessors? From 1721 to 1725, we heard of nothing but the happy and florishing state of our affairs. This must have been owing, according to PUBLICOLA, to the circumstances the Spaniards were in; and therefore this must have been owing to the defeat which they received in the Mediterranean. How came we to hear from the very fame perfons, that all our difficulties and the diftreffes we are in at prefent, ought to be dated before the year 1721? Surely, to be in a florishing flate, a nation must be in a fecure state; and how could that be true, true, if, during the four years I have mentioned, a powerful neighbour meditated revenge, and only waited an opportunity of ftriking home? How could it be declared, even from the throne, that * nothing more than the forms of a congrefs were wanting to eftablish the public tranquility, if the grand quarrel between us and Spain did, in effect, fubfish at that time?

THERE are people to very regardlefs of truth, and to very indifferent to the fhame of being convicted of falfhood, that they never confider, when they affirm a fact, any thing more than the prefent expediency... Strange, almost incredible inftances of this might be quoted. I pass them over in filence for many reasons; and, amongst others, for this reason, that some of them are too recent to be forgot. I stick to the point before me; and shall conclude it by observing that when PUBLICOLA affigns all the difficulties which we have labored under fince the year 1725, to what passed before the year 1721, he is confuted not only by the reasons I have urged, which feem to me unanfwerable, but likewife by an authority which every man. will allow to be decisive.

THE next article to be confidered is this. RALEIGH, who was not fatisfied with PUBLICOLA'S way of accounting for our prefent difficulties, and for the clofe alliance between the emperor and Spain, had afcribed both to our refufal of the fole mediation at Cambray. He is accufed of malicioufly concealing the truth, and of imputing that to ill management; extraordinary refinement and great tendernefs, which was the refult of true reafon. Now I think I can demonstrate that PUBLICOLA is ignorant of the truth; or that he conceals it, I will not fay corruptly, but unfairly.

THAT the treaty of Vienna was actually and in form figned, before it could be fo much as known at Vienna that we had refused the fole mediation, I might grant in one fenfe, and for the fake of argument, tho' I do not believe that the fact is just as he states it; and yet I might fafely deny the fame thing in the only fenfe in which this fact can be of the least use to our author. I can grant that this treaty might be figned in form at Vienna, before it could be known there, in form, that we had refused the fole mediation; before the couriers from Cambray to London, from London to Paris, from Paris to Madrid, from Madrid to Vienna could perform their journies, and the feveral courts could hold their councils and make their difpatches. But the certain knowledge of our refusing this mediation might very well arrive at Vienna before the treaty was figned; nay, the treaty might be figned upon this knowledge, by virtue of inftructions given with this contingency fpecified in them. I fay this might be the cafe; and therefore to affirm this fact, in the terms PUBLICOLA affirms it, is nothing to the purpose. What RALEIGH advanced may still be true.

THAT full powers were given by Spain to carry on the treaty of Vienna four months before this offer of the mediation, is most certainly true : and therefore there is as much reason to be aftonished that early measures were not taken to prevent it, as there is that other measures than what we have seen pursued, were not taken to prevent the effects of such a treaty. Could it be an absolute secret to our ministers, who ought to be well informed; fince they have had fuch immense such as a for for fecret fervice, as were never heard of before their time, that Spain was negotiating at Vienna, during thefe four months? Could it be a fecret to them that, from the death of the duke of ORLEANS, and about a year, at leaft, before this treaty was concluded, the Spanish ministers were full of fears and jealoussies about the completing the infanta's marriage with the king of France? If these things, which were not quite unknown to most private perfons, who observed the course of public events, and who fought information about them, did not escape the intelligence of our mini. fters, how could a confideration of the circumstances, which the court of Spain was in at that period, escape their fagacity?

FROM the time of the acceffion of the king of Spain to the quadruple alliance, the whole management of the court of Madrid had been left to the duke of ORLEANStand his cardinal Du Bois; and if we were drawn into the treaty made at Madrid in 1721, by this prince and his minister, as I verily believe we were, it is eafy to fee who was thanked for this by the Spaniards, and how watchful France hath conftantly been to feize and improve every occasion of rendering our title to Gibraltar difputable, and of wrefting this important place out of our hands. We came then into the congress of Cambray joint mediators with the French, between the emperor and the king of Spain, but not with equal advantage; not with an equal share in the confidence of one of the parties; and with our share in the confidence of the other, perhaps, a little diminished : for it is not unlikely that the private treaty, made at Madrid with the king of Spain, whilft we were mediators at Cambray between him and the emperor, might give umbrage at least to the latter. I know not whether this step did not even occasion some complaint, tho' not in form perhaps, from the imperial ministers.

VOL. I.

 $\mathbf{I}_{\mathbf{N}}$

In this state of things, and in this disposition of all parties, what could it be imagined that the Spaniards should turn themselves to, on the forefight of a rupture of all intimacy, and even correspondence with France? Could they refolve to leave themfelves without any ally with fo many enemies, and with their interests still unadjusted? Could they refolve to run the rifque, in this condition, of falling back into a state of war, when they were about to purchase peace at a price which they thought fo dear ? Could they refolve to abandon themselves intirely to Great Britain, who had hitherto fhewn fo much partiality to the emperor, still their enemy, and whofe principal intercourfe with them had been managed hitherto by France, to whom they expected foon to become enemies? Certainly they could not refolve upon this, even as I have stated the case; much less could they do fo, if they had fuch an inveterate rancor at heart, as PUBLICOLA reprefents. What then could our ministers imagine the Spaniards should do upon a forefight of the infanta's being fent back, and by confequence of breaking with France? I will venture to fay, for it is plain and evident, that if they thought any thing on this affair, they must think the very thing which the Spaniards did. The Spaniards began to treat at Vienna, that they might prepare for the worft; and they delayed concluding their treaty, till. what they feared happened. Give me leave to add, that it was eafy to fee that, whenever the ministers of PHILIP and the Imperialists should come to examine their master's' interest together, they would foon find these interests not for hard to reconcile, nor their want of mediators fo great, as they had imagined, whilst rivalship and pique kept them at a diftance; and that there were men of great weight in the emperor's court, whole private interest must render them particularly zealous to promote this union. All this happened ; and it affords a pregnant inftance of what I faid above, that reafon reafon of flate will determine the conduct of princes, not old stale resentments.

FROM what hath been thus stated I defire to make fome inferences, and to recommend them to PUBLICOLA's confideration.

FIRST then, It appears more ridiculous than ever to talk of the promife of Gibraltar, and the lofs of their fleet as lying at the hearts of the Spaniards, and breaking out upon this occasion. Neither must it be faid absolutely, that our 'refufing the fole mediation at Cambray threw Spain into the arms of the emperor. In what refpect this ftep might con-tribute to it, will be faid prefently. But the principal and determining cause of Spain's uniting fo closely with the emperor, was the fending back the infanta.

SECONDLY, However fudden the immediate refolution for the departure of this princess from France might be; yet this defign had been long in agitation; fo long, that the fufpicion of it had been entertained by the Spaniards, and was even publicly owned by their ministers very many months before they fent their full powers for carrying on a treaty at Vienna.

THIRDLY, There was furely, in the whole progrefs of this affair, notice enough to alarm any reasonable men, and time enough to prepare for the confequences of a breach between France and Spain. During the life of the duke of ORLEANS, he had, and it could not well be otherwife, the chief credit at Madrid. But it was obvious enough that, by fending back the infanta, his fucceffor would furnish us with a fair opportunity of attempting at least to get between France and Spain, as France had flood between Spain and us, and of main-maintaining ourfelves in that poft. This indeed was an object of the utmost importance, which deferved more than all our negotiations have cost us, and which it is not impossible might have been accomplished for lefs. Whenever it shall appear that we took all the measures in our power, in a proper manner and at a proper time, for this great end, infinite honor will accrue to our ministers without dispute.

FOURTHLY, If we had been as much prepared as one would think we might in fo many months have been, we fhould have had fome great advantages, which, if we were unprepared for thefe events, and even furprifed at them, it was impossible we fhould reap.

THE sole mediation could not indeed have been sooner offered than it was; becaufe it could not be offered till Spain had broke with France, and then it was offered to us. Nay, if it had been offered fooner, I agree that we could not have accepted it fooner, for reafons of policy and even of decency. But if we had been prepared for these events, we might have ftruck a great ftroke, as the generality of the world thought, and continue to think, by accepting the media-tion in form, as foon as it was offered. In the cafe fupposed of preparatory measures taken by us, on a forefight of fuch a conjuncture, it is probable that Spain would not have. been extravagant enough to precipitate fo bad a bargain as fhe made for herfelf in the Vienna treaty. Having no mediator nor even ally, fhe was under a necessity of granting almost any terms to the emperor, provided she fecured the main points which the had in view. But, fure of our fupport, and fhe might have had affurances fufficient for her to depend upon, it is impossible to think the would have carried her concessions farther than she needed to have done." In this cafe none of those engagements, which were talked of, of, but which have never yet appeared fo injurious to Britain, could have been taken; and we might have had perhaps the fatisfaction of feeing the peace of Europe confummated by the reconciliation of two princes, the adjustment of whole interests had been to long our care, and whole union is, without doubt, in general, and unlefs fome particular circumstances of a very extraordinary nature hinder it, the common advantage of all those who defire to fee a balance of power preferved in the western world. But I go farther. I will suppose that we had not been able to foften Spain; or that we had not attempted it, which perhaps was the cafe; that Spain looked on us with a jealous, and even a revengeful eye; and in fhort that the mediation was offered to us, without any defign that we should concernourfelves in it, and purely for form fake; yet furely, evena in this cafe, fome advantage might have been taken by our immediate acceptance of it. Our conduct, at leaft, would have been free from any objection, and Spain and the emperor would have been left without any color of excufe. Might not fuch a step have retarded the conclusion of this famous treaty? Might not time have been gained; and would not the least time, in this cafe, have been of the greatest moment to us ?

FIFTHLY, When the mediation was offered us, we could not know how foon the treaty would be figned. It cannot be pretended that we did. Our refufal of it therefore muft have been grounded purely on thefe two confiderations, fooften urged in defence of this meafure, that the Spaniards were our inveterate enemies, and that we were in alliance with the French. What is meant by being in alliance with the French, and making this a diffinction between our relation to them and our relation to the Spaniards, I am at a lofs to find. We were furely in alliance with one nation, as 7 well well as the other, from the moment the king of Spain acceded to the quadruple alliance, and the matters still unfettled at Cambray were folely relative to him and to the emperor. If it be meant that we thought the French our friends, and knew that the Spaniards waited only for a pretended occafion to break out into enmity with us, I think this reason will prove the very contrary of what it is advanced to prove. Did we fuspect that fomething contrary to our interest, fomething dangerous to us, was working up in the negotiation of Vienna; and did we for this very reason decline an opportunity of coming at some knowledge of what was in agitation there? did we, for this very reason, refuse the best means we could have hoped for, of keeping our antient friendship with the imperial court, and of being in a condition to check the court of Spain? Such arguments as thefe will not pass; and whoever produces them hath too mean an opinion of the reft of mankind, and too prefumptuous an opinion of his own fufficiency. On the part of France, no objection could have been made to us, if we had accepted this mediation : for either the points to be mediated upon were pure trifles; fuch as the titles, and other matters of as little weight, referred to the congress of Cambray; in which cafe our accepting the fole mediation must have been quite indifferent to the French : or these points were of moment to the general intereft; and in this cafe, the French ought to have defired that we should continue in the mediation, for the same reasons which ought to have determined us to do fo. If the friendship and confidence between us and the French was not fo strict as it hath been represented, they did not deserve the compliment we made them. If this friendship and confidence were fo strift, they might and they would have trusted us with pleafure. Every one knows how concerned and alarmed the French were at the refentment which the king of Spain shewed on this occasion. Their first care was to try all poffible means of pacifying him. If we could have been one of thefe means, their obligations to, and their confidence in us muft have increafed. We might have treated for them, when they could not treat for themfelves. Inflead of this, by dint of management, we fo difpofed affairs, that the French in a fhort time treated for us with the emperor and the king of Spain, with whom we could not treat for ourfelves.

THE last inference I shall make, from all that hath been faid, is this. As fending back the infanta was the certain and immediate caufe of throwing Spain into the arms of the emperor; fo our refufal of the fole mediation may justly be deemed an acceffory caufe of it. This refufal might give occafion to carry the engagements of these two princes farther than it was for our interest that they should go. At least, our acceptance of it was the fole, probable measure, in that instant, of preventing such engagements; for this union of the emperor and the king of Spain is not, in itfelf, fo terrible. Spain might be as well, nay better for us and for all Europe, in the arms of the emperor than of France; and if this union. is become formidable to us, we may thank for it our own management, through a long feries of bufinefs, and through divers revolutions of affairs ; our too much neglect of Spain ; our too much dependence on France; our being, upon all occafions, indefatigably bufy about the interests of other people, and leaving to other people the conduct of our own; of which furely a more strange example cannot be imagined than that which is before our eyes. We would not attempt, nay we would not confent to be mediators, when we flood in that character, and could fland in no other, notwithflanding all the reasons for it in that nice conjuncture. Such was our delicacy. But we have admitted and (may I be allowed to fay fo ?) we have courted France to act as mediator, where the is a party; for France is a party to the treaty of Hanover; and the treaty of Hanover, with the treaty of Vienna, give occafion jointly to the congress of Soiffons, and all the prefent negotiations.

THAT France is a party in our quarrel, we have been often told; and that fhe would act as fuch, we have been often affured. She was to make befieging Gibraltar a Cafus Faederis. She was to march an army into Roufillon. What was fhe not to do?---But we have feen her act hitherto no part but that of a mediator; a common friend; but unconcerned in the quarrel. No good effect hath yet appeared, even from her offices as mediator. If, by thefe offices, fhe hath kept us from acting for ourfelves, and made us prefer a precarious dependence to a vigorous war, I am fure the effect of her acting in this character hath been a bad one for Britain.

NOTHING can be more plain than that chain of caufes and effects, which hath dragged us into our prefent difficulties; and as these difficulties increased, the obstinacy of Spain must of course increase likewise. If that court had never thought of getting Gibraltar out of our hands, the flate we brought ourfelves into was fufficient to fuggeft the defign to them. When once Spain had purchased the emperor's alliance, (I may use this expression, the treaty of Vienna will justify it) she might flatter herfelf that he would adhere to her, even in unreasonable expectations, fince he had no more to expect from us, and had fo much to receive from her. As foon as we had fagely declined having to do with her, or for her, unlefs in concert with France, with whom fhe would have nothing to do at that time, France employed all poffible means to be reconciled to her. Intrigues of every fort, ecclefiaftical and fecular, were fet on foot. They fucceeded ; and Spain faw faw fhe had nothing to apprehend. What fhe had to hope, I determine not, from this party to the Hanover treaty. The other princes and ftates, who acceded to this treaty, acceded in fuch a manner, as it is eafy to prove, if PUBLICOLA fhould think fit to deny it, that we could have little to hope and Spain little to apprehend from their engagements, in her difputes with us about our immediate interefts.

All other powers foftened towards each other by degrees ; and by degrees we got deeper into the quarrel. Spain, from having no ally, came to have many; fome more, fome lefs to be depended on; none to be feared. From having a multitude of difputes, she came to have none, except with us. We, on the other hand, from having none of our interefts in difpute, are come to fee hardly any others in controverfy. From feeling ourfelves backed by feveral allies, we are come, at least in the points of direct relation to us, to have in effect no ally but one; and with that one we own that we are diffatisfied; nay we own that we are afraid of him. The writer, I am anfwering, infinuates both; nay, he does it almost in express words. He complains of the indifference of France in support of our interests; and of the danger of engaging in a war, in concert with France. Who would have thought it, Mr. D'ANVERS? Here is the London Journal contradicting the Enquiry; and I am able to point out to you many gross instances of his doing the fame thing. Here is PUBLICOLA accounting for our prefent difficulties, now they are come upon us, by the very arguments which were urged against the Hanover treaty, and which proved that the natural confequence of that treaty was just what the event hath fhewn it to be. Those who wrote against the Enquiry foretold what would happen. Publicola justifies. the ministry, by complaining that it hath happened !

VOL. I.

I WILL

I wILL mention but one inftance more of this kind; and that shall be with relation to the Ostend company. " The " grand quarrel, fays PUBLICOLA, was between us and Spain. "The Oftend trade, about which fuch a noife hath been " made, was more the concern of our neighbors, both by "treaty and intereft, than our own."---Now I will leave the world to decide by whom all this noife about the Oftend trade hath been made. Did not you, Mr. D'ANVERS, and feveral other writers, maintain that this company was but of little concern to us, in opposition to the whole party on the contrary fide, who took all poffible pains, both within doors and without, to prove that the Oftend trade was a point of the utmost concern to Britain, and even equal to Gibraltar itfelf? Nay, the author of the Enquiry, who hath now the mortification to fee himfelf given up, in every material article, by both parties; even by those who set him to work, goes fo far, p. 57. of that memorable performance, as to affert that Gibraltar would be of no importance to us, if the Oftend company fhould be fuffered to fubfift; and having labored that point, with all his ftrength, for no lefs than twenty pages together, concludes it thus: " That not " only our own East and West India trade, and that of the " Dutch, will be ruined by the Oftend company, which will " be the immediate effect of it, or rather is fo already in " fome degree, but alfo that the contagion will fpread to " many other branches of the British and Dutch trade; and " convey along with it the riches, the ftrength and the naval " power to the fame Spanish Netherlands.

"Bur were it fo that Holland alone would be the fufferer by the Oftend trade, which is far from being the cafe, yet the ruin of Holland muft carry along with it, in the end, the ruin of Britain." SUCH abfurdities as thefe would provoke merriment in a cafe of lefs confequence; but they provoke indignation in a cafe where the honor and interest of our king and country are fo deeply concerned.

INTO this flate were our foreign affairs brought, when his prefent majefty came to the crown. I mention this the rather, because they, who now think it for their interest to date the rife of all this mifchief fo much backwarder than it can confistently with truth be dated, may possibly find it for their interest hereafter, if new and almost unavoidable difficulties should come upon us, in confequence of what they have done in a former reign, to date the rife of them as much too forward. Let it then be remembered that all which hath happened in this reign, is no more than a prolongation of the fame scene. The great scenes of the world are not to be fhifted at our pleafure. They must be continued fometimes, when we are convinced the most that they are weakly framed. Opportunities must be waited for, and we truft they will happen. We are fure they will be improved by the capacity, the vigor, the experience and valor of our august monarch. A feafonable and powerful effort. hath often broke through the most complicated evils. A word hath often effected what the most tedious negotiations, fuch as we have been accuftomed to, could never have brought about.

I HAVE now done with Mr. PUBLICOLA for this time; and I hope for good and all. If my letter is grown into a greater length than I defigned, this hath been owing principally to an earneft defire of fetting thefe matters (fo often and fo grofly mifreprefented) in a just and clear light. I have advanced no facts but fuch as are of public notoriety, fuch as I know to be true, and fuch as I do verily believe to be fo, upon fuch F f 2 grounds. grounds as reafonable men have always thought fufficient to conftitute, in cafes of this nature, the higheft probability. I have endeavored to pufh no confequence, nor to ftrain any argument farther than I judged it would evidently bear; for whatever PUBLICOLA may think, which concerns me little, I affure you, Mr. D'ANVERS, that I would not have given myfelf this trouble, fmall as it is, of anfwering him for any other reafon but this; that, in order to get well out of our prefent difficulties and dangers, it is neceffary to know truly how we came into them; and that he therefore, who contributes to difpel from before the eyes of mankind thofe mifts of error which are fo induftrioufly raifed at this time, does fome fervice to his king and his country.

Defence of the Enquiry into the Reasons of the Conduct of Great Britain, &c.

SIR,

S foon as I heard that the author of the * Enquiry had condefcended to take notice of a Letter which you thought fit to publifh in your journal of the fourth of January laft, I refolved to make my acknowledgments to him for fo great an honor, and to defire you to convey them into the world. This duty fhould have been discharged

difcharged immediately, if I had not been diverted from it by avocations of a very different nature; and if I had not obferved, on a review of the prefent difpolitions, that there was no reafon in force to make a very fpeedy reply neceffary. What I am going to fay now will, I think, juftify me for what I have faid already, in the opinion of mankind; and at leaft in the fecret thoughts even of the author and defender of the Enquiry: and as this effect of the little additional trouble I am about to give myfelf is the principal, nay, the fole good one which I dare expect, we are in time for that; and by confequence I fhall not lofe my labor by my delay.

THIS author hath thrown feveral matters in my way, to which it is proper I fhould fay fomething before I enter into that which is firifly the fubject of our prefent difpute.

HE declares upon this occafion, with all poflible ferioufnefs, that " he hath not writ, or dictated, or advanced, or, " directly or indirectly, had the leaft part in the writing or " publifhing any paper, which hath appeared in the world, in " any form, from the time of writing the Enquiry, and " from fome time before that," to the twentieth of January " 1728-9." He makes this declaration, " and for that " fpace of time, particularly with a view to papers printed. " in the London Journal; in all which he had been utterly " unconcerned either directly or indirectly."

FAR be it from me to queftion the truth of fo folemn a deelaration. I give entire credit to it; and I freely own that he hath reafon to complain of me for infinuating, at leaft, that he had a hand in the London Journals. The little fhare I have had in the paper war hath not given me many opportunities of knowing the combatants; and the productions on one fide, 3 gave.

gave me little curiofity to enquire after the authors of them. But I found it univerfally affirmed, and no where contradicted, that this gentleman had a hand in the weekly papers just mentioned. The perfons who recommended these papers, countenanced the opinion; and were glad, perhaps, that fo confiderable a name fhould give them an authority which might fupply whatever elfe they wanted. Nay, I found amongst those, who were acquainted with this author, and who profess a particular regard for him, some who were angry at him on this very account; fome who were forry for him; but none who doubted the truth of the fact. What may have given occafion to fo general a concurrence, he can beft tell. I urge thefe circumftances only to fhew, how I was led into an error. It was indeed error, not malice. But still I think myself obliged to take this occasion of asking his pardon; and I do it with all possible feriouf-nefs, as he made his declaration, and from the bottom of my heart; because I am as much convinced, that he neither abetted, encouraged, nor paid the authors of these papers, as I am that he was not himfelf the author of them.

It cannot be imputed to me, that I have any thing to anfwer for, on account of the perfonal feverities which this author, in a very pathetic manner, complains of. We muft acknowledge, and we ought to lament, that our public papers have abounded in fcurrility. One would be tempted to imagine, that the Saturnalia were held all the year round in Britain; for those who can do nothing but rail, have had their encouragements to write; and I am perfuaded that this gentleman's candor will oblige him to confess, that nothing but a thorough contempt hinders complaints from being made against the writers of his own fide, much better grounded and supported by much stronger instances, than Vol. I. G g he he can produce against the writers of the opposite fide, in his own, or in any other cafe. For my part, I should be extremely forry to have it faid of me, with truth, that I had railed at any author, instead of answering, or even in anfwering his book; and less than any would I be guilty of this crime, for fuch it is, towards one who defends, with fo much uniformity of conduct, the liberty of the prefs, that corner-stone of public liberty. He who will support what hurts himfelf, because he thinks it the support of the whole liberty we enjoy, shall meet with nothing from me but that which he deferves from all mankind, the utmost respect, whenever he leaves me the power of shewing it, consistently with the regard I owe to truth, and to my own necessary defence.

HE will not, I hope, think it inconfiftent with this refpect for his perfon, or with that which I have for fome of his writings, if I cannot bring myfelf up to have the fame for his "Enquiry into the reafons of the conduct of Great. "Britain;" or for his "Defence of this Enquiry." He appears to have a paternal fondnefs for the firft of thefe treatifes, which amounts even to a partiality; the more furprifing, becaufe it is found in one who can boaft fo numerous and fo fair an offspring. I fhould not have attempted to draw him out of an error, which he feems to indulge with fo great a fatisfaction, if he had not made it neceflary for me. Since he hath done fo, I will offer fome obfervations on the Enquiry itfelf, before I come to the Defence.

The circumftance upon which he feems to triumph a little, (that the Enquiry was not anfwered) he will permit me to fay is often a very equivocal proof of the merit of a book. The fame mouths, it feems, which pronounced the Enquiry to be a mean and defpicable performance, " have more than. "once. "once expressed in print their earness define that some "able hand would answer it." From what mouths he took this, I know not. But furely the testimony of those who defined some able hand would answer what they judged to be mean and despicable, is an odd testimony for him to quote; fince it could proceed from nothing but a design to ridicule him.

THO' the Enquiry was not anfwered in form, yet I believe that feveral, perhaps all, the points on which his fyftem leaned, were occafionally examined, and fufficiently refuted by you, Mr. D'ANVERS, and by others. If no more was done I take the reafon to have been plainly this. The minifterial air of authority and information, affumed in it, made even thofe, on whom this air did not impofe, judge that it was prudent to wait till time and events fhould open the fcene a little more; and as the fcene opened, they perceived that the Enquiry was daily anfwered, in the moft effectual manner, to their hands; fo that the author might have waited all his life, perhaps, for fomething more of this fort if he had not thought fit to feize an opportunity of defending it, not more worthy his notice, than feveral others before given him; and if my refpect for him, and my defire to ftand fair in his opinion had not determined me to make him a reply.

As to the effect of the Enquiry, which he thinks fo confiderable, that it " awakened multitudes out of a dull and " languid flate into life and vigor; and that it was not found " to procure flumbers either to those who liked it, or to those " who difliked it;" I, who was most certainly one of those who either liked or difliked it, can affirm with the greatest truth, that if it did not procure me flumbers, it did not keep me awake. Some of the facts advanced in it were flatange G g 2 and and furprifing; but then they were deftitute of any proof, except the ftrong affirmations of the author, and collections of circumftances fo extremely trivial, that they became burlesque as soon as they were seriously applied. A bare exposition of any real danger from the pretender would have waked multitudes into life and vigor, tho' the Enquiry had never been written. But I apprehend that fo many pages spent on WHARTON's rambles, RIPPERDA's chit-chat, hearfays of what one great man writ concerning what another great man faid, three Muscovite ships coming to Spain, embarkations which were never made, and armies which were never affembled, could have no other effect than to compose multitudes into perfect tranquility, and to confirm the opinion of their fecurity on this head. Any furmifes of an engagement, on the emperor's part, to affift Spain in the recovery of Gibraltar by force, could provoke no indignation, whatever else it might provoke, nor cause any alarm. We knew Gibraltar to be impregnable to the Spaniards, before RIPPERDA declared it to be fo; and what affiftance the emperor could give them towards reducing this place, unlefs. he had in his fervice fome of Mr. WALLER's winged troops. and Pegafean horfe, we were not able to difcover. As to the emperor's real engagement in this article towards Spain, and as to the engagements of Spain towards the emperor, on the article of trading to the West-Indies, we soon knew. what they were; and with this knowledge our alarm ceafed. What was faid in the long differtations, about the Oftend company, caufed likewife little or no emotion in us. Our interest was plainly not that of principals, till the Dutch had the address to make us fo, by their accession to the treaty of Hanover; and the conduct of our own court, who beheld, with fo much indifference, the rife and progrefs of this company, had taught us to be indifferent about it. Thefe confiderations, and many others which I omit, hindered the Enquiry Enquiry from having the effect, which this gentleman's paternal fondnefs makes him believe it had. The part, if I may have leave to fay fo, was over-acted. But ftill I fee no reafon that he has to be concerned, becaufe one way or other the end of writing it was anfwered. The Enquiry was the book of a day, like fome little animals on the banks of the river Hypanis, which came to life in the morning, fulfilled all the ends of their creation, and died before night.

THERE is a point, on which the author and defender of the Enquiry values himfelf and his book very much; I mean the strict regard to truth which he affures us he observed in writing. Now, tho' I am ready to agree that this author has always a great regard to truth, yet I affirm that I could write a book as big as the Enquiry, filled with nothing but demonstrations of his errors in matters of fact. Too much confidence in the informations he received, too much hafte in compofing, and above all, that fire which is apt to over-heat the imagination of polemical writers, must have caused these errors. It is impossible to account any other way, how a gentleman of nice honor, remarkable fineerity, and even exemplary piety, inftead of making his propositions constantly the refult of the evidence he found, upon a thorough examination, true, fhould, through a whole book, have conftantly fuited his evidence to a certain fet of propositions; and how facts and. dates, as flubborn things as they are in the hands of other. men, should grow foft as wax under his touch.

But it is not my defign to enter into a disquifition of this fort. It would shew ill-nature, which I hope I have not; and it would be now of no use whatever. I must however defend myself, as unwilling as I am to offend him; and therefore fince he contradicts what I faid, viz. that "he had been "given up in every material article of the Enquiry;" I think myself. myfelf obliged to prove it. " How eafy are fuch words as " thefe," fays our author, " but how hard to fupport them?" Now I do affure him that thefe words, as far as they may be thought harfh or impolitic, will at no time fall eafily from my tongue or pen; but he will find that it is eafy for me, upon this occafion, to fupport them. I will confine myfelf to the four great points of danger, arifing from the Vienna treaties, and mentioned already. Let us fee whether he has been given up in them or not.

According to the Enquiry, we were in danger of lofing not only our East and West-India trade, but many other branches of the British trade, by the privileges supposed to be granted to the emperor's fubjects, and from the enjoyment of which privileges we are debarred. Nay, it was very ftrongly infinuated that even the ruin of Britain was involved in this point. If this had been the cafe, and if the treaty of Vienna had thus fettled the matter, there would have been occafion for all the outcries which we meet with in the Enquiry, and for ftill more. But our moft knowing merchants gave up this point, as foon as they read and confidered the feveral clauses; and it is notorious, that the contracting powers declared, as foon as they heard of the objection, that their meaning was not to give thefe privileges to the imperial fubjects above other nations; and that they would explain the text accordingly, if any ambiguity made it neceffary. But in truth there was little or no ambiguity in the matter, except what the representations of it occafioned; for without entering any deeper into it, let us observe that the answers which this author gives to the objection, which he was forced, from the notoriety of the thing, to make to himfelf, are evalive and fallacious; for fince the fame liberty of entering the Spanish ports in the West-Indies, in cafe of distress by bad weather, or for refreshment, 7

refreshment, is granted to us by the treaty of 1670, as is granted to the imperial subjects by the treaty of Vienna, does it follow that more is granted to them than to us, because the liberty granted to us hath ceased for many years? If we have not made use of the liberty, the fact affirmed is nothing to the purpose. If we have been denied it, such denial is an infraction of the treaty of 1670, and proves that we have had injustice done us by the practice of the Spaniards; but doth not help to prove that we have had any done us by their concessions to the emperor, with whom they may keep this article, perhaps, as little as they have done with us, and who is not likely to have the fame means of obliging them to it as we have in our power, whenever we please to employ them.

How the eighth article of the treaty of Utrecht came tobe quoted, on this occasion, is to me marvellous. That article is made general to all nations; but was particularly directed against the French, who, even at that time, continued to obtain licences to fend ships to trade in the South-Sea, as they had done all the war. But the treaty of Utrecht confirms the treaty of 1670; and the stipulation, that "no " licence, or any permiffion at all, fhall at any time be given. " to the French, or any other nation whatfoever----to fail, " traffic, &c. to the dominions fubject to the crown of Spain " in America," cannot furely be construed to deprive us of the right of going into those parts, in the cases allowed by the treaty of 1670. This feems fo clear, that I may pronounce the gentleman given up, on this head, by the most knowing merchants, and by every man who can read and understand what he reads ...

But I may go farther; for it appears even from the fiftharticle of the provisional treaty itself, which is faid to fecure.

us from the dangerous engagements contained in the treaties of Vienna, with relation to trade, that the king of Spain "never underftood to grant, by the faid treaty, any privi-"leges contrary to the treaties confirmed above; nor to give "to his imperial majefty any greater advantages than thofe "enjoyed by other nations in their commerce; his imperial "majefty adopting for his fubjects the above-mentioned de-"claration, made in the name of his catholic majefty." And it is very obfervable that this article feems to be inferted in the treaty, merely upon the furmifes of the minifters of France, Great-Britain and Holland, who have pretended, as it is faid in the introduction to it, " that in the treaty of "commerce, concluded at Vienna on the firft of May, 1725 "---there were divers claufes, which clafhed with articles " of feveral treaties of commerce, anterior to the year " 1725," &c.

IF therefore the natural fenfe of the Vienna treaty itfelf, as well as the declaration of their imperial and catholic majefties, as foon as the objection was first started, and their offer to remove any supposed ambiguity in this article of the Vienna treaty, were not sufficient to fatisfy us: what farther fatisfaction shall we receive by the provisional treaty, in cafe it should be accepted, which contains only the very fame declaration? ---But this hath been sufficiently explained already by your correspondent RALEIGH.

As to the Oftend trade, he thinks that I myfelf cannot be againft him, unlefs in the degree of the importance of it. Now this is the very point upon which he must be given up, in this cafe, if he is given up at all. I never heard that any man was wild enough to affirm, that the trade carried on from Oftend, was of no confequence whatever to us. But the queftion is, whether that trade be of that degree of importance

tance to us, which he reprefents. He afks, "who of those I " oppose hath declared against him in this?" I answer, The very perfon I quoted in the passage he had before his eyes, when he asked this question. He fays, in the Enquiry, " that " our East and West-India trade will be ruined by the " Oftend company; that they are fo already, in fome de-" gree; that the contagion will fpread to other branches; " in fhort, that this trade will carry riches, ftrength, and " naval power from us to the Spanish Netherlands." What fays PUBLICOLA? " The Oftend trade, about which fuch a " noife hath been made," (he must mean by the enquirer, fince the enquirer made more noife about it than all the other writers put together) " was more the concern of our " neighbors, both by treaty and interest, than our own." I appeal now, in my turn ; and I appeal to the enquirer himfelf. Is not one of these representations directly contrary to the other? Does not PUBLICOLA diminish the confequences of the Oftend trade to us, and treat it even lightly? Does not he magnify it, in the ftrongeft terms, and make our all depend upon the obstruction of it? Does not PUBLICOLA, an author whom I oppofe, give him up?

We are now come to the danger, much infifted upon in the Enquiry *, '' of having Gibraltar wrefted out of our hands '' by force, if it be poffible, unlefs we will bafely yield it up ;'' and this danger is grounded on a fuppofed + mutual engagement between the emperor and king of Spain, contained in a fecret offenfive treaty. The writer of the Enquiry confeffes, '' that the imperial refident read to fome of our mi-'' nifters the words, which he faid were the contents of the '' article which his mafter had entered into, relating to '' Gibraltar ; the which implied, that his mafter had en-

" gaged to use his good offices for the restitution of Gibral-" tar." Now from hence, becaufe this refident read all that related to this point, and did not fhew the whole treaty to us, any more than we thought ourfelves obliged to fhew to the imperial ministers the treaties of 1721, which we made at Madrid with one of the parties between whom we were at that time mediators, in the congress at Cambray; from hence, I fay, the writer I am answering concludes that the truth of what he imputes to the emperor flands confirmed : but this offenfive alliance hath appeared hitherto no where, except in his writings; and the article relating to Gibraltar, in the defensive alliance between the emperor and king of Spain, is furely as contrary as possible to all that he hath advanced. By that article it appears, that the Spaniards affirmed a promife on our part to reftore Gibraltar. In confideration of this promise, the emperor declares he will not oppose this restitution, if it be made amicably; that if it be neceffary, he will employ his good offices, and even his mediation, if the parties defire it. Till therefore the enquirer can shew another article between the contracting powers in the Vienna treaties, about Gibraltar, this must be reputed the fole article of that kind, and by confequence a flat contradiction to all that he hath faid on this occafion; fo that if his own fide do not give him up in this cafe, both they and he will be given up, I fear, in the opinion of every other man in Europe; to which I fhall add, fince the observation lies fairly in my way, that every man, who knows any thing of the interest of Europe, knows it as much the interest of the emperor, that Britain fhould keep Gibraltar, as it is the interest of one of our allies that we should lose the possession of this place; and yet we have been taught, by fome profound flatefmen, to apprehend the emperor's efforts to take it from us, and to rely on the affistance of France to preferve it to us.

I HAVE referved to the last the greatest of all those dangers, which are represented in the Enquiry; and that is the danger of the pretender.

IT is there affirmed, * " that one express article of the al-" liance between the emperor and Spain, contained an ob-" ligation in favor of the pretender, and a flipulation to " make the attempt for him in England, before opening " the war in any other parts." Nay, this author was fo well informed of all these proceedings, that he gives us the particular engagements which the pretender, in return, took towards the emperor and Spain. All thefe things are afferted in the ftrongest manner, as founded on "positive intelligence; " on intelligence from more than one perfon; on undoubted " intelligence; and fuch as could be entirely depended on." Now I fufpect that the enquirer would think me very impertinent, if I should seem to question the authority of his intelligence; and yet I verily believe, that I have better reafons to do fo than he had to depend upon it, when he writ the words I have quoted. But we will wave faying any thing more on a point on which it is proper for neither of us to fpeak plain. His good opinion of the intelligence communicated to him will not give it the ftamp of infallibility; nor will my bad opinion deftroy its credit. The world will therefore judge, or rather has judged, of the validity of what he does not explain, by the force or weaknefs of the other circumstances which he enlarges upon; and by observing whether the course of events hath justified this boafted intelligence or not. I have just mentioned above the chief of these circumstances; and notwithstanding the great refpect I have for this author, nothing shall oblige me to treat them more ferioufly. I will fhew him, however, that the courfe of events hath deftroyed all the ufe he pretended to make of these circumstances, and that it has contradicted, instead of confirming his intelligence. He fays, * " that " the vigorous refolutions taken, and the preparations and " difpositions made by Great Britain, suspended the exe-" cution of this defign. The Spaniards found themfelves " obliged to fend part of their ships from Cadiz and St. " Andero to the Weft-Indies, and the Mufcovite fhips re-turned home."----Very well ! The event does not yet justify the intelligence; but that is accounted for. The execution of the defign was fuspended for the prefent. The defign went on then; and the preparations for an invation by confequence. It must have been fo; for we find in the Enquiry, + that the defign thus fuspended was afterwards prevented by the appearance of a British fleet on the Spanish coaft. Now let me defire you, Mr. D'ANVERS, to take the trouble of turning to Sir JOHN JENNINGS' letter, dated Au-gust 10, 1726, and made public here; in which you will find the Spaniards fo little prepared to invade us, that when he came on their coaft, they feemed to be in the greateft consternation, that all the troops they could affemble did not exceed three thousand men, and that these were in very bad condition.

I ASK now, is the intelligence of the enquirer, upon this head, fupported by any thing but his own affirmation? Is it not contradicted by the whole courfe of events? Does there appear the leaft reafon to believe that he had a fure foundation to build upon, when he made fuch bold affertions, and of fuch a nature? The fecret offenfive treaty, which he talks fo much of, has never appeared, nor any footfteps of it; and many people are apt to believe that it never exifted any where

but in fome people's luxuriant fancy. The feveral treaties made at Vienna in 1725, between the emperor and Spain, have been long public; and when it was obferved, fome where or other, that nothing was contained in them like what the enquirer had afferted, the enquirer was given up. He was faid to be miftaken. The article, in favor of the pretender, was faid to be in fome other treaty; and afterwards in no formal treaty. It was not a treaty. It was an engagement. This may be called, by fome ill-bred people, fhuffling : but fure I am that it muft pafs for a direct giving up of this author; who will find, perhaps, if he pleafes to enquire into the particulars of what paffed on this occafion, that the perfon who gave him thus up, had fome fhare in fetting him to work.

AFTER this, it is hardly worth notice, that the author of the "Obfervations on the Conduct of Great-Britain" has given him up likewife; for the utmost which this writer ventures to fay, when he comes to speak of this engagement, afferted by the enquirer to be contained in an article of a treaty, is this; "our apprehensions were that "there might be engagements in favor of the pretender." Let the enquirer confider again, whether I was in the wrong to advance, that he had been given up, even by his own fide.

HAVING juftified what I prefumed to advance concerning the Enquiry, I come now to the Defence of it.

THE gentleman begins this Defence by flating the cafe, fo he calls it, as he did in the Enquiry; and then he proceeds to take notice of what hath followed fince the date of that book; that is to fay, he reprefents the matter in difpute, juft as it fuits his purpofe; leaving out many things neceffary to fet fet the whole in a true light; afferting fome things, which have been never proved ; and others, which I think never can be proved; making what infinuations, drawing what conclutions he thinks fit; and in a word, begging the queftion in almost every line. It is hard to conceive for what purpose this is done. The reason given, I am sure, is not a good one; fince the principal facts and reasonings upon which the strength of all that can be said must be sounded, are fo far from feeming to be forgot, that they feem to be the only things remembered, or thought of at this time, and are the common topicks of almost every conversation. There must therefore be some other reason for this method of proceeding; and I can guess but one. This method may perhaps be thought proper to catch unwary readers, and to give a particular bials to their minds, with which they are to read and to judge of all that follows. I could make use of the fame art; and, without being at much pains, draw up a state of the cafe very contrary to that which he hath drawn, and at least as plaufible. But I think the proceeding too unfair to copy after it. I have indeed no reafon to do so; fince, very indifferent to all other confiderations, I feek nothing in this difpute but the difcovery of the truth : and therefore, as I will receive nothing but what is supported by the evidence of fact, and the force of argument, fo I will not prefume to attempt imposing any thing, void of both, upon others. Befides, this gentleman undertakes to "con-" fider what I have advanced, either against any thing, in " which he can be fuppofed to be concerned; or upon any " fubject of debate, (of this debate he means) which appears " to him to be of importance :" fo that if I am able to refute all that he objects to me, in the Defence of this Enquiry, I refute all objections, of any importance, to what I have faid in my former letter to you; and then I imagine that his flate of the cafe will do him no great honor, and his caufe little good.

DEFENCE OF THE ENQUIRY, &c. 239

THE first point on which I am attacked by the defender of the Enquiry is, on the turn, fo he calls it, which I have given to the very beginning of this whole scene. He means the Vienna alliance.

LET us fee therefore whether it is he or I, for one of us may, perhaps, have done fo, who hath endeavored, in treating this fubject, to turn every thing to the fervice of fome other caufe than that of truth.

In the Enquiry, he reprefented the Vienna alliance, as to the manner, and as to the matter of it, to be one of the most astonishing phaenomena which ever appeared in the political world. What furprize to fee two princes, rivals almost from their infancy, " two powers, that could hardly be " kept within the bounds of common decency towards one " another, privately running into one another's arms," as he expresses himself? What a surprize to see the emperor abandon the mediation of Great Britain and France; to the first of whom he and his family owed fo many obligations; and to the last of whom, in conjunction with the first, he owed the acquifition of Sicily, and the other advantages of the quadruple alliance? What a furprize to fee Spain abandon this mediation, just in the moment, as my adverfary has extremely well observed, when the interests of the duke of PARMA were in agitation; interefts which Spain had extremely at heart; and in the fupporting which, fhe had reafon to think herfelf fure of fuccefs against the emperor ; becaufe the mediators had taken fecret engagements with her to favor these interests, by one of the treaties made at Madrid in 1721? What a furprize to fee Spain do this, and in doing it, not only forego the advantages which the mediators had procured, and were to procure for her, in many respects; particularly, in that favorite point, the succelfion fion of Don CARLOS; but make so bad a bargain for herfelf at Vienna, that the emperor, according to this author, and indeed I think according to the truth, "gained every thing, "and particularly the guaranty of his own fucceffion?"

ALL this, it must be confessed, appeared wonderful, and excited a strong curiofity to know what were the springs of spreat, and, according to these representations, so sudden a revolution of counfels and interests. But here we were dropped. The enquirer fpent much time, and took much pains to fhew what did not occasion it; but I have not observed, that he pretended to shew what did; unless he meant, that we should take, for causes of it, those terrible defigns which he imputes to the emperor and the king of Spain. Our ministers, who seem to have foreseen so little that France and Spain might break, and that the negotiations then on foot might be thrown into confusion, or take fome new courfe, by this rupture, grew it feems prodi-gioufly alert and fagacious afterwards. They did not forefee what happened; but they discovered strange mysteries of iniquity concealed under this transaction, when it had happened; and these mysteries we find pompously unfolded in the Enquiry, with all the improvements and embellishments which the author's luxuriant fancy could beftow upon them. Now fuppofing these discoveries to have been real, the things so discovered can be looked upon no otherwise than as circumftances of the general measure; the measure, which the emperor and Spain took, of treating by themfelves and for themfelves; and therefore they wanted to be accounted for as much as the measure itself : but upon this head, I fay, the enquirer gave us no fatisfaction. Far from explaining to us what might induce Spain to take fuch a refolution, at that particular point of time, rather than at any other, he did not afford us the leaft hint to guess, why we should fhould take it at all; and yet fo ftrange an effect muft have had fome very confiderable caufe; too confiderable certainly to be abfolutely a fecret, and even beyond the reach of conjecture.

THIS remarkable defect was, I believe, felt by every perfon who read the Enquiry; and therefore in the progress of the dispute, the writers of the fame fide thought it incumbent upon them to affign fome caufe, which might appear proportionable to fuch extraordinary effects; and which, at the fame time, might not be inconfistent with what their great master, the enquirer, had advanced. The task was not easy; and indeed they have fucceeded accordingly. Some laid the caufe of all in that inveterate rancor, which they fuppofed the court of Spain to have conceived against us, on two accounts; the promife made by lord STANHOPE about Gibraltar, and the defeat of the Spanish fleet in the Mediterranean. When this was exploded, and I think it was fo as foon as examined, they had recourse to another system; a very strange one indeed : for it declares that the emperor, France, and Great Britain, the three contracting powers with Spain in the quadruple alliance, acted the most perfidious part imaginable in that whole proceeding; fuch a part as FERDINAND the catholic, or LEWIS the eleventh, would have flartled at. The fucceflion of Don CARLOS, was, it feems, * a point, which all the powers of Europe strenuously opposed; which the emperor, who had already obtained his defires in the affair of Sicily, could not be for; to which the French were averfe; which Great Britain had reason to oppose and prevent; and which it was plain that the Spaniards could never carry in a congress, where every party was an enemy to their intentions. Surely nothing fo extravagant, nothing fo infolent as this was ever yet advanced ! If you, Mr. D'ANVERS, had prefumed even to infinuate any thing like it, I believe you would have been profecuted with all the feverity poffible; and I am fure you would have been given up by all your friends. Neither can I conceive how the enquirer, who is fo zealous an affertor of our honor in the observation of treaties, could pass by such an imputation as this, without darting his thunder at the impious head who devifed the. flander; unless he thinks it an irremissible fin to account for any thing in contradiction to himfelf; and a venial fault to accufe Great Britain and France, as well as the emperor, of fomething worfe than a violation of treaties; even of. making them with a defign to break them; and of obliging a prince, by long negotiations, and by a war, to accept conditions, which they never intended should be made good to him.

AMONGST others, I prefumed, at laft, to account for this great event upon principles which I believed to be true, notwithftanding all that I read in the Enquiry; and which I ftill believe to be true, notwithftanding all that is faid againft them, in the defence of the Enquiry.

THE defender begins with quoting two or three paffages, which relate to the fending back the infanta, and the point of the fole mediation, out of my letter to you; and then, without difproving the facts, or fo much as mentioning the argument grounded upon them, he pretends that the whole is hypothetical; and thinks it would be a full and fufficient reply to me, to " frame a fcheme on the other fide, and to " oppofe fuppofition to fuppofition, and one arbitrary inter-" pretation of appearances to another." After which he proceeds to frame fuch a fcheme, partly on facts, which he would have us believe true, and partly, as he fays himfelf, from

from his own invention; and this he thinks proper to oppofe, in a ludicrous manner, to the account I have given.

Now if it shall appear, on examination, that I have built upon undeniable facts, and have reasoned justly, instead of building on suppositions, and giving arbitrary interpretations to appearances, this author's smartness will turn upon himself, and, instead of shewing that I deferved no answer, he will only have shewn that he was unable to give me a good one.

LET us enter into this examination.

I affirmed, and I do still affirm, that from the death of the duke of ORLEANS, the Spanish ministers were full of fears and jealoufies about the completing the infanta's marriage with the king of France. Neither do I find any thing urged in the Defence of the Enquiry, to deftroy the credibility of this fact. Indeed, if it was proper to defcend into particulars of fo delicate a nature, it would not be at all difficult to demonstrate, from a confideration of the change which was made in the French ministry, and of the difference of perfonal fituations, interests and views, that altho' there never could have been room for fuch fears and jealoufies as thefe, while the duke of ORLEANS had lived, yet there was great room for entertaining them, under the administration of his fucceffor. But this is not all. These fears and jealousies increased and strengthened daily, in the minds of the Spanish ministers; and if this author pleases to enquire, I believe he will find, or else his prompters deal very unfairly by him, that the delay and excuses of the court of France, about performing the ceremony of the Fiancialles, which Spain expected should have been performed soon after the time at which the duke of ORLEANS died, confirmed, in the higheft Ii 2 degree, degree, the fufpicions already taken. The ceremony of the Fiancialles would have fecured the marriage. What other effect then could excufes and delays in this affair produce, but that which I have mentioned?

THE Enquiry * fays, " that the refolution of the court of " France, relating to the infanta, did not come, no not in " fufpicion to Madrid, till March 8. N. S. 1724-5." If he means the particular refolution of fending her back at fuch a determinate time, that is nothing to the purpofe, how much foever the affirmation might impose, when it was made use of at first, and before this matter had been fufficiently canvaffed. But if the refolution of fending the infanta back, at fome time or other; in plain terms, the refolution of not complèting her marriage with the king of France be meant: then, I fay, that I might very justly have fet this affertion down in the lift of those which are made in the book without a strict regard to truth; for it is undeniably true, that the Spanish ministers in foreign courts, entertained this suspicion above a year before that time. It is equally true, that feveral months before that time they fpoke of this measure, as a thing they expected; and I add, that feveral private perfons, at leaft, writ from Madrid in the fame stile, to their correspondents in other countries. Of all this I am as fure, as I am fure I now hold a pen in my hand; or that a pamphlet, called " A Defence of the Enquiry," is now lying before me; and therefore neither the authority of the Enquiry, nor any better authority can perfuade me, that the fuspicion of a defign to fend the infanta back from France, did not come to Madrid till March 1724-5; because it would be abfurd to believe, that the ministers of that court were less informed or less jealous about an affair of this importance, than private perfons; or that the repeated advices, which must have come from the Spanish ministers abroad, made no impression upon those at home.

THIS fact is, I think, pretty well established; and the others I am to mention will occasion no dispute. They are these. The Spaniards * first took the resolution of throwing off the mediation, and of treating at Vienna in November 1724; and RIPPERDA's full powers were figned, according to the Enquiry, on the 22d of that month; that is, about a year after the death of the duke of Orleans. Soon after this, the negotiation was begun; but the treaties, in which it terminated, were not figned till the last of April and the first of May 1725.

THESE, I prefume, are facts, and not suppositions. Let it now be confidered how I argue upon them; and whether my reafoning be nothing more than an arbitrary interpretation of appearances, as the author of the Defence hath rashly pronounced, but not ventured to attempt to prove. The fum of my argument is this. Since the Spaniards expected that the infanta would be, a little fooner or a little later, fent back from France, they expected to find themfelves, a little fooner, or a little later, obliged in honor to fhew a due refentment of this affront, to fend back the princeffes of the houfe of Bourbon from Spain, and to break off that correspondence which had subfisted between the two courts, from Spain's acceffion to the quadruple alliance, and which had been fo intimate, during the life of the duke of Orleans. They could not forefee how long this rupture might laft, becaufe they could not forefee how foon a change would be made in the French ministry, and fatisfaction be given them for this affront; but they could not fail to forefee, that if this event should happen during the congress of Cambray, fomething worfe than the affront would follow, and they muft remain in the moft abandoned condition imaginable; broke with one mediator; not fure of the other; the emperor in poffeffion of Sicily; and the reciprocal condition, in favor of Don CARLOS, not effectually fecured to them. Thefe things are fo intimately and neceffarily tied together, that I can as little difcover how it is poffible to allow the firft fact which regards the fufpicions and expectations of the Spaniards, and deny the confequences which follow, as I can fee how it is poffible to contradict, with the leaft appearance of reafon, a fact fo publicly known, fupported by fo many circumftances, and juftified by fo many confequences as the firft is. The probable arguments employed in the Defence, and which, it may be pretended, will ferve to prove that tho' the fact were true, and the fufpicion I have infifted on was entertained by the court of Madrid, yet that it did not produce the effects of throwing Spain into the engagement fhe took at Vienna, will be confidered prefently.

THUS far then, as we have a deduction of facts, not of fuppolitions; fo we have a thread of confequential arguments, not a rhapfody of arbitrary interpretations of appearances. The cafe is fairly flated, and no imaginary fcheme is offered to be imposed for truth. The probability, which refults from this flate, is confirmed, and I think turned into certainty by the event. By the flate above-mentioned, it was probable that Spain would take meafures, in time, againft the diffrefs to which fhe must forefee that fhe flood exposed. Accordingly, the Spaniards began to treat at Vienna before the infanta was fent from France, which is a fact allowed on all hands, that they might prepare for the worft; and when I add, that they delayed concluding their treaty, or that the conclusion of their treaty was delayed till what they feared happened, happened, what do I affirm more than what my adverfary allows? He had faid, at first, that the "treaty of peace "was figned at Vienna, before what Spain feared from " France was known there." He has corrected that affertion, and has faid, " that as the treaty of peace was agreed to at " Vienna before what Spain feared from France was known "at Vienna to have happened; fo it was figned before the " refusal of Britain could be known there ;" that is, the refufal of the fole mediation. The first point then is yielded to me. The Spaniards did not actually fign at Vienna, till the news came thither, of the infanta's being actually fent from France; tho' they had fettled and agreed their terms' with the imperialists, on the knowledge that she would be fent away. On the fecond point, all that I urged, as fact or argument, stands in the fame force it did before; for I defire this author may not be indulged in a liberty I shall never take with him nor any one elfe, the liberty of carrying. my affirmations, by strained constructions, farther than the plain and natural import of the terms I employ.

IN oppofition to PUBLICOLA, I fhewed that the manner in which he affirmed the treaty of Vienna to have been figned before the refufal of the mediation was known there, did not refute RALEIGH, on account of fome poffible circumftances there mentioned. Now this author has been forced to leavethe proof, drawn from those poffible circumftances, just as he found it. "There is no proof," fays he, "but the bare: "poffibility here infisted on." I fay no more. The argument is as strong against him, as against Publicola; for even after the advantages taken over Publicola, for not express himfelf clearly, this author has, for reasons easy to be guessed, expressed himfelf in a manner liable to the fame objection. "The peace was figned," he fays, "before the refusal of "Britain could be known." What ! before it could be known by certain and direct intelligence, or before it could be known in form, after the tedious round which this refolution was to take? That is not explained; and yet that was the fingle point on which any thing could be faid to the purpose. In short, we purfued with great fleadiness, our wife maxims of neglecting Spain, and of adhering closely to France; infomuch that those who wished us no good, were perhaps heard, when they infinuated that, far from contributing to ward off a blow fo much apprehended by Spain, we privately abetted France, in her defign of breaking the match, and imagined by that measure, to establish an irreconcilable quarrel between the two courts. The Spaniards, as well as the imperialists, had reason to believe, from our whole conduct, that we fhould not accept the fole mediation, which had been offered to us; and was it then ftrange that the former, neglected by us, provoked by France, fhould prefs the figning this treaty, without waiting long for our answer; or that the emperor, who got fo much by the bargain, fhould confent to it?

HAVING been thus led to the affair of the fole mediation, which I had hitherto omitted to fpeak of, in order to avoid confusion, I shall confider it here, as far as this author has made it necessfary for me. In my letter to you, Mr. D'AN-VERS, I dwelt a good deal upon it. I placed it in every light, and debated all the merits of the cause, as well as I was able. Now, if what I urged was absurd and nothing to the purpose, this author should have shewn, in general, that it did not deferve a more particular answer. If what I urged was clear and strong, as some people imagine it was, this author, who declares himself, in every point, of a contrary opinion, should have had the goodness to examine and refute my arguments. How it happens I know not; but this great master of polemical writing hath, in every instance, upon this occasion, avoided to enter into the argument. He hath dwelt on the outfide of things, and hath generally cavilled at circumftances.

I HAVE just now given a strong instance of this; and I lay hold of the opportunity to tell this gentleman, that I am no apologist for Spain, tho' he endeavors to fix that character upon me by an innuendo, fo very fine, that I was for fome time at a loss to find out his meaning. I neither founded to arms against the Spaniards, two years ago; nor am, at present, an advocate for bearing their delays and their infults. I neither aggravated, two years ago, the depredations and hostilities committed in the West-Indies by the Spaniards; * " and those violences, by which the whole " commerce of Jamaica hath been well nigh destroyed, and " the trade of that island reduced to a miserable condition;" nor do I now soften in their favor, and call these outrages and loss by the gentle name of + " inconveniencies attend-" ing a ftate of uncertainty."

But to return. Having given an inftance of this author's cavilling at circumftances not material in the difpute, I fhall now give fome inftances of his affirming over again, by way of answer, what had been refuted before; and when I have done this, I shall have taken notice of all that he fays upon the super the fole mediation.

FIRST then he fays, that the knowledge of the negotiations going on at Vienna was a just reason to decline this offer, which he supposes to have been a mere piece of mockery. But he does not so much as pretend to fay a word, in answer to what I infisted upon, as an advantage in accepting this mediation, even supposing it offered to us without any design that we should concern ourfelves in it. He does not pretend fo much as to controvert what I urged, to prove that the worfe opinion we had of the defigns carried on at Vienna, the more reafon there was to catch at this offer of the mediation.

SECONDLY, he infifts, that we could not accept this mediation, with a due regard to our alliance with France; and he fuppofes, that this reafon will be thought just by " all " those who do not think the breach of faith, and the vio-" lation of treaties, matters of no concern." Here again . is another charitable innuendo. But let it pass. It would be eafy to ftrengthen all that was faid on this fubject, in my Letter to you, by fhewing the difference between fuch a ftipulation as this of a joint mediation, and the covenantswhich princes and states enter into with one another, about their mutual interests. But there is no need of it, fince this author, who thinks fit to infift on this point, hath not thought fit to answer any one of the arguments urged by me, to prove that France could not have complained of us, if we had accepted this mediation; and yet there were fome dilemma's laid down, which feemed to deferve a folution.

LASTLY, he pretends that I affirmed, against the most public facts, and the plainest appearances, what I faid to shew that our acceptance of the mediation must have been agreeable to France : and yet what I faid was founded on public facts, and the plainest appearances; which he has not touched, because he durst not deny them. It is really very strange, that so considerable an author should continue to write, when he can neither find out new arguments, nor answer the objections made to old ones. HAVING now difpatched the point of the fole mediation, it remains that I fay fomething to those probable arguments, if they deferve that name, which I have civilly given them, by which this gentleman pretends to deftroy what is, I think, established on the folid foundation of fact and reason, concerning the measure taken in France after the death of the late duke of ORLEANS, to break the match with the infanta, and the consequence of that measure, the throwing Spain into the hands of the emperor.

Now the first of these arguments is, that the court of Spain did not mention this affront from France, as any inducement to the transaction at Vienna; and that any fuch mention would have been inconfistent with other declarations made to Mr. STANHOPE at Madrid. Very well. It is then an established rule, that we are not to believe a court has motives for their conduct, which motives they do not own, altho' we have the ftrongeft reasons imaginable to believe fuch motives true. Another rule, which this author would do well to establish at the same time, and which is founded on as much reason as the former, is this; that we are to believe all the motives which a court thinks fit to give out, to account for their conduct, altho' we have the plainest proofs imaginable that these motives are false. Such logic as this was never introduced into politics, I believe, before; and I am perfuaded that you, Mr. D'ANVERS, will excuse me, if I spend no time in answering it. Let me defire you however, before I leave this argument, to turn to the thirteenth and fourteenth pages of the Enquiry, where you will find that the enquirer fays, the imperial ministers at Cambray, at London and at Paris, talked the very language, which the defender of the Enquiry fays the Spaniards were always ashamed to make use of *. ### AN ANSWER TO THE quirer adds, that "upon the first public news of the Vienna "treaty at Madrid, the difcourses of many were taught to run "that way, and to dwell upon that fame popular topic."

THE fecond of these arguments is this. If the news of fending back the infanta from France, and of Great Britain's refusing the fole mediation, had both come to Madrid before RIPPERDA was fent from thence; even this " could " not have really been, and would not have been pretend-" ed to have been the motive of what was afterwards done " at Vienna." And why, pray? Becaufe when the news of our refusing the fole mediation did come, the court of Spain acknowledged it to be a reafonable proceeding. This, you fee, is built on the principles laid down in the last article, and deferves no farther notice. But on the news coming to Madrid, that the infanta was fent home, he confesses that " the court of Spain might, by fuch circumftances, be " induced to try what honorable terms the emperor would " come to." This conceffion goes farther than he is aware of; for I defire to know if it is reasonable to believe that Spain would have treated with the emperor, when the cafe had happened, why it is unreafonable to believe that Spain did begin to treat with him on almost a certain prospect that the cafe would happen; which is the great point we have been contending about? Ay, but Spain would not have treated with the emperor to hurt Holland and Britain, becaufe Spain had been hurt by France; nor would the emperor have entered into a treaty to hurt them, who had no part in the affront to Spain and never injured the emperor. Again ; much lefs would the king of Spain fend a minister to Vienna to enter into and finish treaties, which should hurt other nations, upon a fufpicion that France would hereafter affront him. I could make feveral reflections on fome of the expressions in this place; and on the turn, which the author takes, takes, of putting fome very odd arguments into my mouth; and, what is ftill more, into the mouths of the emperor and the king of Spain. But I forbear; and content myfelf with faying two things, which will effectually blunt the point of all the wit employed in this paragraph, and fully anfwer the whole of what is faid farther upon this fubject, in the Defence of the Enquiry.

FIRST then; as far as I am from being, or pretending to be, a mafter in politics, which degree this writer feems to have taken long ago, I never imagined that the affront, confidered merely as an affront, precipitated Spain into all the engagements fhe took with the emperor; tho', by the way, he mistakes very much, if he thinks, as he fays, that he may deny new fresh resentments to determine the conduct of princes, exactly upon the fame grounds, as I have denied that old stale refentments have this effect. What I imagined, what I faid, and what I proved was, that this affront, confidered as a neceffary breach with France, at least for a time, would throw Spain into fuch circumstances of distrefs, as fhe was to prevent by all poffible means; and that therefore reason of state determined in this case; tho' no doubt the affront, at the fame time, provoked the Spaniards. Thus. I am confistent with myfelf; and the author might have spared himself the trouble of writing this elaborate paragraph, if he had adverted to my fense, instead of playing with my words.

SECONDLY; as to the emperor, our author is guilty of begging the queftion; for the emperor will infift, as he has infifted, that his engagements were not engagements to injure any body; that he entered into no offenfive alliance; and that, when he exacted from Spain the guaranty of the Offend trade, and of his fucceffion, he exacted the guaranty of nothing.

thing but of that, which he judges he has an independent right to eftablish and secure. As to Spain, it will be likewife faid, that when his catholic majefty treated with the emperor, he never meant to hurt other nations, but to fecure his own interests; that if his guaranty of the Ostend trade hurts the Dutch or us, he is forry for it; but could no more avoid that engagement than he could several others extremely difadvantageous to himfelf, and into which he was however obliged to enter, because he was obliged to purchase the emperor's alliance at any rate: that therefore we must not blame him, who opposed the establishment of the Oftend company, whilft he could do it, without any fupport from us; who never gave his guaranty to it, till he was forced to do fo, by the neceffity of his affairs; into which neceffity he was falling for above a year together, without feeing the hand of Britain once ftretched forth to hinder it. Such answers as these would certainly be given; and, in the mouths of the imperialists and the Spaniards, they would be juft.

IF, after all that has been faid, this gentleman is unable, upon my notions, to account for the king of Spain's refolute flying from the mediatorfhip of France, I am fure it is not my fault. A few facrifices did indeed help to pacify Spain, and to reconcile her to France; and a few facrifices might, for aught I know, have reconciled our quarrels; or, which is better, have prevented them. But as no one can forefee now when fuch facrifices will be made here; fo neither could Spain, at the time when fhe fent to Vienna, forefee when fuch facrifices would be made in France.

UPON the whole matter, and to conclude this tedious article; if the way in which I have endeavored to account for the refolution taken by Spain to abandon the mediation of Cambray,

DEFENCE OF THE ENQUIRY, &c. 255

Cambray, and to treat at Vienna, be not right, I fhould be glad to know what the right way is. No other, which this gentleman, or any reafonable man will venture to fupport, has been yet pointed out. But I apprehend the account I have given to be a juft one; becaufe it is built on fact and reafon; becaufe the event hath, in every refpect, confirmed it; and becaufe it fhews not only why Spain broke with France, and applied to the emperor; but why Spain entered into thefe new measures, after the death of the duke of ORLEANS, which it cannot be pretended the ever thought of doing, while that prince was alive. If now this account be a juft one, many melancholy but ufeful truths refult from it.

BUT I need not point out these things. The world will discover them, without any help of mine, and will judge how well the Enquiry hath been vindicated, by the author and defender of it upon this head.

THE next point, upon which my reafonings and imputations are to be tried at his tribunal, is that of Gibraltar; and here he fets out, by accufing me, not in terms indeed, but in a manner almost as plain, of lying, of direct, premeditated lying. I will keep my temper, tho' a field large enough is opened to me, and tho' the provocation is not: a little aggravated by the folemn air with which this accufation is brought, by the pretences to patience and meeknefs and candor, and by all the appeals to God with which my accufer hath, in feveral parts of this treatife, endeavored to captivate the good opinion of mankind, and to eftablifh his own reputation, that he might make fure of ruining that of others. He calls to my mind the character of Morsus in Tasso's Aminta.

I wILL have the decency not to translate the verfes into english.

IT is not neceffary that I fhould fay much about the jealoufies which this author feems to complain arofe at one time, left Gibraltar would be given up or artfully betrayed into the Spaniards hands; nor about the vigorous defence of it, which was made afterwards. Thus much however I will fay, that when Sir JOHN JENNINGS was called home, with all the troops embarked on board his fquadron, juft before the fiege, and even from the neighborhood of Gibraltar; when the Spaniards were fuffered, under Sir CHARLES WAGER's eyes, to transport by fea many things neceffary for the attack of the place; and when it was known that the town wanted almost every thing neceffary for the defence of it, people ftood a-gaze, and not without reason. The cries of the nation precipitated at last the fupplies, and the vigor of the garrison made a glorious use of them.

I COME now to the accufation brought against me by this writer. I faid, in my Letter to you, that the Spaniards ground their prefent claim to the restitution of Gibraltar, on a "pri-"vate article in a treaty made with them in 1721, stipulating "the contents of a letter to be written by the late king, and on "the letter written in pursuance of this article." This is the fact. The accusation is, that there is no such article in the treaty; and many words are employed to cut off all pretences is  $\frac{5}{5}$ of excufe, and to pin the lie upon me. Now I defire it may be obferved, in the first place, how very exact and knowing a critic this gentleman is; who, after pronouncing with fo much emphasis, that " he hath read the treaty himself, and " finds no one article belonging to it, which hath the leaft " relation to this fubject," proceeds to mention the treaty, and quotes a wrong one. No man would have imagined that fuch a flipulation could have been fupposed to be in the defensive alliance between Great Britain, France and Spain, of the thirteenth of June, 1721, who had known that there was a diffinct private treaty, of the fame date, between Great Britain and Spain. But this, it feems, was a fecret to my accufer; tho' the treaty had appeared printed in the fourth volume of Rousser's collection, when he committed this mistake. It was of this treaty I meant to speak; and the reason why I expressed myself in that manner was this. I have had fome years by me an extract of this very treaty, which was long kept a great fecret, and for the keeping of which fecret there is an express provision in the fixth article of it. When the treaty became public, I found that my extract of the feveral articles was exact; and therefore I gave the more credit to the feparate article, mentioned in the fame extract, as belonging to this treaty, and flipulating the contents of a letter to be written by the late king. The letter I never faw; but the account I have had of it by those who have read it, agrees with my extract. All this induced me to think, that there was fuch a feparate and more private article, belonging to this private treaty; nor was I at all furprifed to fee the treaty come abroad without this article; knowing full well that treaties often appear, when the fecret articles belonging to them do not .--- This is a true ftate of the cafe; and will, I believe, fufficiently juftify me for what I writ. But I have not yet done with my accufer. Let it be, that no fuch private article, as I was led to fup-VOL. I. L 1 pofe, pofe, does exift, or was ever executed. Will he venture to fay that no fuch article was drawn up, as he expresses himfelf, about the treaty of pacification ? Will he venture to. deny that if our ministers were afraid to fign such an article, and therefore did not fign it, the reafon on which the Spaniards were induced to recede from this point, was that fomething equivalent fhould be done; and that this fomething was his late majefty's letter to the king of Spain? I appeal, in my turn, to the loweft obferver, as well as the highest, who hath gone about to deceive mankind, this author or I; this author, who conceals from the world what he knows, or might know, with all the means of information which he has in his power, and what fets the matter in quite another light than he hath represented it : or I, who, having not the fame means of information, fell into an undefigned miftake; which does not alter the ftate of the cafe in favor of my argument, fince, if the Spaniards accepted this letter, which was writ in lieu of the article which was not figned, their pretentions, and nothing but their pretensions are under confideration here, will be still the fame.

As to the letter itfelf, what I affirm about it is, that the Spaniards pretend it is a politive engagement to reftore Gibraltar to them. That this fhould be allowed them, I am as far from agreeing as this author can poffibly be; but that the letter is fufficient to keep up their pretenfions, I affirm : and that in fact they do keep up their pretenfions on this foundation, is notorious. Was this gentleman to difpute the point with the Spaniards, he might comment as much, and diftinguish as fubtily as he pleased, on the terms of the letter : the others would infish, that it was given them as an engagement; that if they had not received it as such, they would not have departed from the article; and I doubt they would would be apt to infinuate, that we could not have found a more proper cafuift than himfelf, to diftinguifh us out of our obligations, amongst their own schoolmen, or amongst all the fons of LOYOLA.

To fpeak ferioufly; it were to be wifhed extremely, that the Spaniards had not had this color for perfifting in their demand of Gibraltar, or that it had been by an express and clear flipulation taken from them; fince it is certain, that the right and posseficient of Gibraltar is nothing less than afcertained to Great Britain by the preliminaries, as they fland; " and confequently, that all claim of Spain to it again is " not extinguished."

I contradict him in his own words, tho'.none of the propereft; and I will prove, in what I am going to fay, either that he does not at all underftand the matter he talks fo magifterially about, or that he attempts, in this inftance, to deceive the world, by giving wrong interpretations to fome things, and by concealing others.

IF then, altho' the letter of the late king hath given the Spaniards a pretence to claim Gibraltar, this claim is effectually barred, and even extinguished by the first general words of the fecond article of the preliminaries; how comes it to pass that Gibraltar was not specifically mentioned, in order to prevent any future chicane? It will be faid, I know, that as the king of Spain's accession to the quadruple alliance vacated any promise which my lord STANHOPE might have made; fo the king of Spain, by confenting to these preliminaries, has vacated any engagement of this kind, which the letter may be supposed to contain; and I, perhaps, shall be quoted again as "one, who must necessaria-" rily fee the force of this argument." But this author must not judge of my eye-fight by his own; for I fee a manifest difference between the two cafes. My lord STANHOPE's promife is faid to have been conditional; all allow that it was verbal; and I think it is allowed likewife, that the late king never confirmed it. The fimple acceffion of the king of Spain to the quadruple alliance, might therefore be thought very justly fufficient to put the matter, at that time, out of all difpute, for the reasons given by me, and quoted by this author. But when the preliminaries were to be fettled, the king of Spain's claim to the reftitution of Gibraltar refted on an engagement, or what he took for an engagement, entered into by the late king, and under his majefty's own hand. Befides, this engagement, or promife, whether valid or not valid, had been infifted upon as valid, in a formal treaty, and had been made the foundation of the fecond article in the defensive alliance between the emperor and the king of Spain, which relates to Gibraltar. It required therefore fomething more to put. an end to a claim founded in this manner, than to a claim. founded on any promife that my lord STANHOPE could make. These confiderations could never escape the penetration of that most able minister, who negotiated the preliminaries; and therefore I conclude, first, that the Spaniards would not confent that Gibraltar should be mentioned specifically in the fecond article; and, in the next place, that they could refuse to confent to it on no reason whatever, but this one, that their pretenfions to Gibraltar would be kept alive, if it was not mentioned specifically, notwithstanding the general words fo much infifted upon by this writer. He has not therefore answered my demand; nor shewn " in the preliminaries an article, which is indeed as express " and effectual a confirmation of our right to Gibraltar, as. " if the word Gibraltar had been put into it." But he goes on, and observes, " that the latter part of this second. ". article-

" article greatly ftrengthens the former ; becaufe it is there " flipulated, that if any thing shall have been altered with " refpect to rights and poffeffions, or not have been put in " execution, the alteration made, or the thing not executed, " is to be discussed in the congress, and decided according " to the tenor of the faid treaties and conventions;" that is, in his fense, according to the tenor of the treaty of Utrecht, and of the quadruple alliance; for he mentions no other, except that of Baden, which hath nothing to do here. Now, fays he, " nothing, either as to the right of " Great Britain to Gibraltar, or to the poffession of it, hath " been at all altered; nor hath there been any non-execu-"tion, &c." From whence he infers, that our right to Gibraltar is not included in this description of points left to be difcuffed in the congress. But how could he avoid feeing that he affumes for granted the very thing difputed ? No alteration hath been made in " our right to Gibraltar, fays he; therefore this right cannot be discussed." An alteration hath been made in this right, fay the Spaniards, by a private engagement taken with us in 1721; therefore this: alteration is to be difcuffed at the congress. Who doth not fee, that whether this right shall be found to have been altered, and what the alteration imports, are by this preliminary to be difcuffed and decided at the congrefs?

I THINK, I have now fhewn what I undertook, and what: this gentleman challenges me to fhew; that is, I have fhewn those general words in the preliminaries, upon which the. Spaniards may found a pretence for reviving their demand. of Gibraltar; or, to speak more properly, fince they have never ceased to make it, for continuing this demand. But I have undertaken something more; and therefore will proceed to shew what this gentleman was ignorant of, or what: hee he concealed very unfairly, becaufe it is decifive againft him.

I THINK he could hardly be ignorant that the fecond article of the preliminaries, not only recalls the treaties of Utrecht and Baden, and the quadruple alliance, as he quotes the article, but likewife all treaties and conventions which preceded the year 1725; which latter words he does not quote. Perhaps, he judged them unneceffary. If he did fo, he was much miltaken; for by the fifth article of the treaty of 1721, between Great Britain and Spain, it is declared, " that all the pretentions of both fides, touching " affairs not exposed in the prefent treaty, and which pre-" tenfions are not comprehended in the fecond article of it," shall be treated of in the future congress; which was at that time the congress at Cambray. Now let it be observed, that the affair of Gibraltar is not one of the affairs exposed in this treaty. Let it be observed also, that the pretension of the Spaniards to Gibraltar, is not one of the pretentions comprehended in the fecond article of it; and then let any man deny, if he can, that, in the intention of Spain, thefe words were relative to the pretention, which the acquired by the private engagement taken in the letter fo often quoted. If the letter gave her a right, as the infifts, it gave her a pretention certainly to claim that right, and this pretention is carefully preferved by the treaty of 1721. I do not fay among other pretenfions; for I think I may venture to fay, that all other pretenfions are fpecified in the treaty; even that relating to the free exercise of the Roman catholic religion in Minorca: and therefore thefe words feem to have been fingly applied to the pretentions of Spain on Gibraltar. Will not the Spaniards now infift, upon these foundations, that they enjoyed in 1721, a right to demand the restitution of Gibraltar, by virtue of conventions then made; and that the the fecond article of the preliminaries preferves entire, to allthe contracting parties, whatever rights, as well as poffeffions, they had by virtue of any treaty or conventions, antecedent to the year 1725; and that therefore the first general words of the fecond preliminary preferve to them the right of demanding the reftitution of Gibraltar, as a right acquired by conventions made before the year 1725; whilf the last general words of the fame preliminary article preferve this right as an alteration made in the treaty of Utrecht, and in the quadruple alliance ?

How little weight foever the defender of the Enquiry may allow to these observations, which would I doubt have somein a congress, yet he must allow that they ought not to have escaped him, or to have been concealed by him; fince they do certainly affect the merits of the caufe on which he has fo politively pronounced judgment, without any regard to them. But I am almost ready to ask your pardon; Mr. D'ANVERS, for faying fo much on this point, when there is another more clear, and more decifive still behind. Is it poffible our author fhould never have heard of a certain public inftrument, containing a declaration explanatory of the preliminaries made by the French minister at the Pardo, on the fourth of March 1728, and accepted and confirmed by himfelf, and by the Imperial, British, Spanish, and Dutch ministers on the fixth of the same month? If this instrument hath ever fallen into his hands, and it is in every body's elfe, did he never read thefe words in it, " that all " pretenfions, on all fides, shall be produced, debated, and " decided in the fame congress?" The difputes about contrabands, and other complaints made by the Spaniards concerning the ship prince FREDERIC, and the disputes about the reflitution of prizes, which articles are taken notice of in the introduction to this inftrument, are, by particular claufes in it, referred to the difcuffion and decifion of the congrefs. To what purpofe then were thefe general words inferted? To what purpofe was it flipulated that all pretenfions whatfoever (among which the pretenfion of the Spaniards to the reflitution of Gibraltar muft neceffarily be included; fince, whether ill or well founded, it is ftill a pretenfion on their fide) fhall likewife be referred to the congrefs; and that his "Britannic majefty fhall be obliged " to ftand to what fhall be decided upon the whole?" But I forbear to prefs this matter any farther upon the gentleman; fince it would be, in fome fort, like ftabbing him on the ground.

I proceed to the article of blocking up the galleons; which is the last upon which I am attacked in the Defence of the Enquiry. And here I must observe again, that he is very far from entering into a refutation of the arguments advanced by me to prove, that feizing the galleons was a measure liable to no objection, and in every refpect preferable to that of blocking them up. He observes indeed, upon Mr. Hosser's letter, that the treasure had been taken from on board the galleons, when our fquadron arrived before Porto Bello. Now, without making any reflections on the intelligence brought from on fhore to the admiral, and taking it for granted, that all this treasure was in time removed out of his reach; it will still be true, that this circumstance proves nothing in defence of the measure taken to block up the galleons, and not to feize them; fince whether they would have the riches on board them or not, when Mr. HOSIER should arrive, could not be known when his instructions were drawn. If all thefe riches had been actually at Porto Bello, when he came thither, he would have had, in effect, nothing more to fay to the Spaniards, than what the orders they had received ten ten days before from old Spain imported; which was, that they fhould fecure the money in the country.

THE fingle point, infifted upon to justify this measure, and which the writer pronounces to be fufficient, is that the contrary measure, that of feizing the galleons in port, with all their treasure on board, if it had been practicable, would " have put Europe into a flame, by putting all the pro-" prietors of those riches, whether French, Dutch or Spa-" nifh, into the greateft uneafinefs." At the fame time he allows that taking thefe fhips, if they " had attempted, by " force or ftealth, to come out, had been reafonable." Sure I am it is enough to fay in reply to this, that as to the uneafiness which such a feizure might have given the Spanish proprietors, it deferved no confideration; that the French and Dutch proprietors would have believed, or ought to have believed, their effects as fecure in our hands, as in the hands of Spain; especially in a point of time, when they were, by treaty at leaft, engaged on our fide in oppofition to Spain; and laftly, that the diffinction between feizing the galleons at fea, or blocking them up in port, as if one was, and the other was not an hostility, is very manifestly a diftinction without a difference; to prove which, I dare appeal to every man in Britain, whether he would not efteem the hoftility as great, and the infult greater, if a Spanish squadron should block up Portsmouth, than if it should cruize in the channel, and take our fhips at fea. The gentleman cuts the difpute fhort, by referring us to the obfervations on the conduct of Great Britain; and I shall readily join iffue with him, by referring, on my fide, to the Craftfman Extraordinary, in which these observations are fully answered, and treated as they deferved to be.

HAVING

HAVING mentioned the galleons, our author could not avoid taking fome notice of a question I asked, in answering PUBLICOLA, and which he allows to be very material. His answers to it deferve a short reflection or two. " Since " the gallcons are coming home, hath Spain renounced those " defigns, which our fleet was fent to the West-Indies to prevent ?" Thus he states the question ; and his answer is, " Truly I can't tell; nor can any one in the world, who " is not in the fecrets of the court of Spain." A little afterwards he asks the fame question; "Has the king of Spain renounced his projects?" that is, those defigns which our fleet was fent to the West-Indies to prevent? His answer is, "Yes undoubtedly, as far as articles ratified by him can "bind; and as far as any contracting powers can be "bound by treaty to one another." Let us fee what is urged between the first and the fecond asking of the fame question, to produce fuch a wide difference in the answers. The king of Spain hath ratified the preliminaries, in confequence of which the fiege of Gibraltar is raifed. Orders are fent to reftore the South-fea ship; and he has promifed that the. effects of the galleons shall be delivered. He hath therefore renounced his projects by treaty; but whether he hath re-nounced them in his heart; "whether he will go on to act. " an open and honeft part," that is more than our author. can tell. It is more likewife than any one will defire, that he: or those, for whom he is an apologist, should pretend to tell, or be answerable for. But let us see what they are answer-. able for; what has been really done by treaty; what we have. · obtained to make us fome amends for the rotting of our ships ; for the lofs of fo many thousand lives, and for the depredations and hostilities which this author founded fo high formerly ; and which were carried on with redoubled vigor, during the pacific blockade of the gallcons--- The effects of the. galleons are to be delivered. I congratulate the Dutch and. the. 5 the French upon it; but especially the latter, who have such immense wealth on board them. Our share is, I fear, a small one; too fmall to bear any proportion to the expence we have been at, or the loffes we have fuftained .--- Orders are fent to reftore the South-Sea ship; but the claims of the Spaniards either on that ship, or on any account, are preferved to them, and referred to a congress, by whose decifion we must abide; and nothing is stipulated, which may fecure to our merchants a just recompense for the numberless feizures and captures of their effects and ships .--- The siege of Gibraltar is raifed; but the right to the poffeffion of that place hath not been effectually put beyond difpute. The obftinacy and the chicane of the Spaniards have prevailed fo far, that they preferve, even by the preliminaries, a pretence for bringing this right to be decided in the congress; and I shall be glad to hear what ally we have there, on whose good offices we can depend for fecuring to us the right of poffeffing, and the poffeffion of this important place .----Upon the whole, I am extremely forry to find, that I was fo much in the right, when I advanced that no man could fay, with truth; that the main things in difpute between us and Spain, were yielded to us before the return of the galleons; unless he reckoned our keeping Gibraltar, and I might have added the procuring fatisfaction to our merchants, not among the main things in difpute, but among those of lefs importance .---- I fay very fincerely, that I had much rather have been refuted.

IT appears, I think, from what hath been faid, that the author and defender of the Enquiry, has not only been given up by his own fide, but even by himfelf, in feveral particulars; and feveral other points, which were infifted upon in the Enquiry, and have been difputed in other writings, are M m 2 either either not mentioned at all in the Defence, or in fuch a flight manner as plainly fhews the author's confcioufnefs that he cannot support them, tho' he is very unwilling to give them entirely up : fo that the author gave a very partial title to his laft production, which can be juftly called, at beft, a Defence only of fome points in the Enquiry, and is more properly speaking, a "Recantation of it, with a few par-" ticular exceptions."

BUT now, Mr. D'ANVERS, what fhall I fay to you in excufe for fo many and fuch long letters? The best thing I can fay, is to affure you, and I do it very folemnly, that I will trouble you with no more of them. The gentleman to whom I have now replied, may enquire and defend, as much as he pleafes, without any farther moleftation from me. When I began to write on this fubject, I meant nothing lefs than the filly ambition of having the last word in a dispute. I faw, like every other man, the public diftrefs. I thought I discerned the true and original cause of it. The affectation, which I observed to turn us off from this scent, fortified me in my opinions, and determined me to examine what was alledged against them. I have done fo; and if in doing it, I have contributed in any degree to open the eyes of my countrymen, on their true, and on their mistaken interests, I have obtained the fole end which I have proposed to myfelf. I love and I hate ; I efteem and I despise ; but in a case of this moment, I should abhor myself, if any regard to perfons, any confideration, except that of truth, had guided my hand in writing.

I BEGAN by asking pardon of this author for an injustice which I have done him through error, not malice; and I shall conclude with affuring him, that upon whatever principle he may may have treated me, as I think I did not deferve, I lay down my refertment with my pen, and remain in chriftian charity with him.

I RETURN to the bufine's of my low profefion in life; and if I was worthy to advife him, I would advife him to return to that of his high calling; to feed the flock committed to his charge. That I may the more effectually perfuade him to take a refolution to much for his own honor, and for the advantage of the church, I will exhort him to it, in the words of the apoftolical conftitutions, with fome very little variation, in order to render the paffage more applicable.

LETTER I.*

SIR,

Since the bufy fcene of the year is over at home, and we may perhaps wait feveral months before the fuccefsful negotiations of France furnish us with new hopes of a general pacification, and give you occasion to carry your speculations forward, it may be proper enough for you to caft your eyes backwards, to reflect on your own conduct, and to call yourfelf to account before your own tribunal.

I AM fo much perfuaded of the integrity of your intentions, that I do not in the leaft fufpect you will think my advice impertinent; and therefore I shall attempt to lead your thoughts on this subject, by giving you an account of fome parts of a conversation, at which I happened to be prefent very lately.

SEVERAL of your papers and feveral of those which have been written against you, lay before a company, which often meets, rather to live than to drink together; according to that distinction which TULLY makes to the advantage of his own nation over the Greeks. They dispute without strife, and examine as difpaffionately the events and the characters of the prefent age, as they reafon about those which are found in hiftory. When I came in, a gentleman was faying, that your victories had been cheaply bought; and that he had not feen one champion, able to break a launce, enter the lifts againft you; upon which fome were ready to obferve the inconfistencies of human nature, and how hard it often proves to hire men to avow and defend even that which they are hired to act. Others were willing to hope that corruption had not fpread very wide, nor taken root very deep amongft us. All agreed, that if your papers could be fuspected to be written in opposition to the prefent ministers, the feeble and low opposition you have met with, would deferve to be looked upon as a very melancholy fymptom for them; fince it would denote that their caufe was deemed univerfally bad; or that their perfons were grown univerfally odious among men of fense, ingenuity and knowledge. It would denote their guilt, or their misfortune; perhaps both.

HERE one of the company interposed, by observing very prudently, ' that any thing fo void of probability, as not to ' fall even under fuspicion, was unworthy of farther confide-' ration. But, faid he, whatever particular views Mr. D'AN-' VERS may have had, one general effect, which I cannot ap-' prove, has followed from his writings. We must remember ' that when he began to publish his weekly lucubrations, uni-' verfal quiet prevailed, if not universal fatisfaction; for in ' what place, or at what time was the last ever found ? Few ' people enquired; fewer grumbled; none clamored; all ac-' quiesced. Now the humor of the nation is altered. Every ' man inquires with eagerness, and examines with freedom. ' All orders of men are more intent than I ever observed them ' to be on the course of public affairs, and deliver their judg-' ments america a series a

' ments with lefs referve upon the most important. From this ' alteration, for which the Craftsman is chiefly answerable, no ' good confequence can, I think, proceed; and it is visible ' that feveral inconveniencies may.'

To this many of us could by no means affent. We apprehended that in a country, circumstanced like ours, and under a government conftituted like ours, the people had a right to be informed, and to reason about public affairs; that when wife and honeft measures are purfued, and the nation reaps the advantage of them, the exercise of this right will always be agreeable to the men in power; that, indeed, if weak and wicked measures are purfued, the men in power might find the exercise of this right difagreeable, inconvenient, and fometimes dangerous to them; but that, even in this cafe, there would be no pretence for attempting to deprive the people of this right, or for difcouraging the exercise of it : and that to forbid men to complain, when they fuffer, would be an inftance of tyranny but one degree below that which the triumvirs gave, during the flaughter and terror of the proferiptions, when by edict they commanded all men to be merry upon pain of death.

THE perfon from whom we differed, brought us back to the particular cafe of your writings, Mr. D'ANVERS. He endeavored to support what he had faid against them in this manner:

' THERE was no good reafon for raifing this fpirit, which I ' diflike, in the nation, when the Craftfman began to write, or ' there was fuch a reafon. If there was none, why has he ' given fo much alarm? If there was one, how has it come to ' pafs that fo great an alarm has produced fo little effect ? Will ' you Nn 2

'you fay that he had very good reason to rouze this ' fpirit, but that it has hitherto had no opportunity of exerting itfelf? Or will you fay that his reafons were good and the opportunity fair, but that the minds of men, ' which have been convinced by the former, have not yet. · been determined to improve the latter? I observe on all these alternatives, that if there was no good and ' even prefling reason to raise such a spirit in the nation as I ' diflike, (becaufe I expect no national benefit, and I fear ' much inconveniency from it) Mr. D'ANVERS has acted a very wicked part, and is little better than a fower of fedi-' tion .--- If there was fuch a reafon, but no fuch opportunity, he has acted a very weak part, and is but a shallow politician .--- If there was fuch a reafon and fuch an opportunity, <sup>4</sup> but no disposition in the minds of men to follow their con-' viction, you may excuse your favorite author, perhaps, by ' alledging that the minds of men are in the power of God alone; but you will reprefent our national condition ' to be more defperate than I ever thought it, or am yet ' willing to believe it .--- Upon this supposition I affirm that "Mr. D'ANVERS is not to be excused, if he continues to 'write; for if he cannot raife this difpolition by perfua-' fion, what does he aim at farther ? I hope that he and you, ' who defend him, admire as much as I profess to do that " divine faying of PLATO: " We may endeavor to perfuade " our fellow-citizens; but it is not lawful to force them even. " to that which is beft for them,"

WHILST all this paffed, I took notice that an antient venerable gentleman fhewed more emotion, and greater impatience than I remembered to have feen him ever express before. As foon as the other had concluded, he broke filence in the following manner:

11 . . . .

You have endeavored to prove, fir, that the Craftfman fhould not have begun to write; or at leaft that he is inexcufable for continuing. Now I not only differ from you, but I differ from you upon the very foundation on which you have eftablished that whole argument.

' THE face of things was, I agree, as calm as you re-<sup>e</sup> prefent it to have been, when my honeft contemporary <sup>e</sup> CALEB took up his pen. They were halcyon days truly. 'We were not only quiet, but we-feemed implicit, and dull ' uniformity of eternal affent prevailed in every place. I ' agree that, fince that time, things are very much altered. ' A ferment, or spirit, call it which you please, is raised ; ' but, I blefs God, it is not the blind and furious spirit of ' party. It is a fpirit, which fprings from information and ' conviction; that has diffused itself not only to all orders ' of men, as you observed, but to men of all denominations. ' Even they who act against it, encourage it. You cannot ' call it toryism, when such numbers of independent whigs ' avow it. To call it whigifm would be improper likewife, when fo many tories concur in it. He, who fhould call it ' jacobitism, would be too absurd to deferve an answer? ' What is it then? It is, I think, a revival of the true old ' English spirit, which prevailed in the days of our fathers, ' and which must always be national, fince it has no direc-' tion but to the national intereft ; " eft jam una vox omni-" um;" and I hope we shall never have occasion to add, " magis odio firmata quam praefidio."

THE other affented; the flate of the difpute was fixed; and the old gentleman proceeded in his argument to this effect:

GIVE me leave to borrow, upon this occafion, an image which my lord BACON employs, in one of his Effays, upon another. A people, who will maintain their liberties, muft pray for the bleffing of JUDAH, to avoid the fate of ISSACHAR, the greateft curfe which can befal them. Far from jogging on filently and tamely, like the afs between two burthens, fuch a people muft preferve fome of the fiercenefs of the lion, and even make their roar to be heard like his, whenever they

fending thefe liberties at any rifque; as he may, at all times, feel in his heart the courage of venturing his life to maintain his honor. But as there is no neceflary confequence from this private character to that of a quarrelfome bully; fo neither is there any neceflary confequence from

THUS we fee how great a truft is repofed in those to whom fuch powers are committed; and if we look into the heart of man, we shall foon discover how great, tho' unavoidable a temptation is laid in their way. The love of power is natural; it is infatiable; almost constantly whetted; and never cloyed by possible. If therefore all men will endeavor

• vor to encreafe their power, or at leaft to prolong and fe-• cure the enjoyment of it, according to the uncertain mea-• fure of their own paffions, and not according to the ftated • proportion of reafon and of law; and if neither one nor • the other of thefe can be attempted without a danger to • liberty; it follows undeniably that, in the nature of things, • the notion of a perpetual danger to liberty is infeparable • from the very notion of government.

• IN perfect democracies these precautions have been taken • in the highest degree; and yet even there they have not • been always effectual. They were carried fo far in the Athe-• nian form of government, that this people seemed more in • danger of falling into anarchy than tyranny; and yet one-• of their magistrates found means to become their tyrant, • and to transmit this power to his fucceffors.

'IN mixed governments, the danger muft fill be greater.
'Such a one we may juftly reckon that of Rome, as well dur'ing the regal as republican flate; and furely no hiftory can 'be more fruitful in examples of the danger to which liberty
'ftands exposed from the natural, and therefore conflant de'fire

' fire of amplifying and maintaining power, than the Ro-' man hiftory is, from the laft of the kings to the first of ' the emperors.

• A monarchy, limited like ours, may be placed, for aught • I know, as it has often been reprefented, juft in the middle • point; from whence a deviation leads on one hand to ty-• ranny, and on the other to anarchy; but fure I am that if • we are fituated juft in the middle point, the leaft deviation • is the more cautionally to be guarded againft. Liberty • would be fafer, perhaps, if we inclined a little more than • we do to the popular fide.

IT may be faid, and I would anticipate the objection, that if we are thus placed, our care ought to be exerted equally againft deviations on either fide; and that I am the more in the wrong to appear fo apprehensive of those on one fide, and fo little apprehensive of those on the other;
because even our own history might have shewn us, that deviations to the popular fide have cost us at least as dear as ever those to the other fide can be pretended to have done..
But let it be confidered;

FIRST, that as far as thefe national calamities, hinted at in the objection, have been the unavoidable confequences of methods neceffary to fecure or retrieve liberty, it is infamous to repine at them, whatever they have coft.

SECONDLY, that the cafes compared together, and fuppofed in this objection to be equal, are not fo. I may fafely appeal to every impartial reader of our hiftory, whether any truth he collected from it ever ftruck him more ftrongly than this; that when the difputes between the king and the people have been carried to fuch extremes, as to draw national calamities after them, it has not been.
Vol. L. Q. Q.

" owing primarily to the obflinacy and weak management of the court, and is therefore unjuftly charged on the juft fpirit of liberty. In truth a fpirit of liberty will never deftroy a free conflitution; a fpirit of faction may. But I appeal again, whether those of our princes, who have * had fenfe and virtue enough to encourage the one, have 4 had any thing to fear from the other.

' Now if experience fhews, as I am perfuaded it does, that ' the prerogative and power of a prince will never be in any ' real danger when he invades, neither openly nor infidi-• oufly, the liberties of his people; the fame experience will • fhew that the liberties of a people may be in very real • danger, when, far from invading the prerogative and ' power of the prince, they fubmit to one, and are even fo ' good as to encrease the other. The reason of this dif-' ference is plain. A fpirit of faction alone will be always * too weak to cope with the legal power and authority of the ' crown; and the fpirit of liberty, in the whole body of the ' people, which contradiftinguishes this cafe from the other, <sup>4</sup> may be raifed by the fear of lofing; but cannot be fo raifed
<sup>6</sup> the hope can only be particular to a few. The fear there-" fore may become a general principle of union; the hope " cannot.

BUT if a national spirit cannot be any other than a de-4 fenfive, and therefore unprovoked, an harmlefs, inoffenfive 4 fpirit; that of a prince cannot, without due coercion, be 'kept within the fame bounds; for here the tables are turned; and the hope of acquiring, which can never be a common principle among the multitude, to unite and carry ' them into action, becomes an almost irrefistible motive to " the prince; who, by yielding to it, indulges the moft ' powerful 7 powerful paffions of the foul; who finds many to fharethe difficulties and dangers of the enterprize with him;and who fhares the prize with none.

GENERALLY and abstractedly speaking, therefore, as pubic liberty is more exposed under mixed governments, than under perfect democracies; so is it more exposed under limited monarchies than under any other form of mixed government.

• But the fovereign prince, who rules in a limited mo-• narchy, has an opportunity open to him for life; and fuch • an opportunity as requires no extraordinary perfonal qua-• lifications. He may poffefs every vice or weaknefs, which • is oppofed to the virtues, or appearances of virtue, requi-• fite in the other cafe, and yet may deftroy the liberty of • the braveft people upon earth. The pretences for con-• cealing his defigns, and the helps for carrying them on, • which his fituation affords above that of any magiftrate in. • Q. o. 2. • a commonwealth, will abundantly compenfate for the difadvantages arifing from his perfonal character, and will fecure his fuccefs, if the people are brought, by artifice or accident, to grow remifs in watching over their liberties. Every man is therefore fit for fuch an undertaking. If thefe general reflections evince that liberty muft always be in fome degree of danger under every government; and that this danger muft encreafe in proportion, as the chief powers of the ftate are entrufted in fewer hands and for longer terms; then liberty is always in fome degree of danger; and that not the leaft, even under our excellent conflitution; then the neceffity of keeping this jealous fpirit, the true guardian of public liberty, always alive and active in this nation, is manifeft; then the obfervation of our being fallen into the contrary temper is alone a fufficient reafon to juftify Mr. D'ANVERS for joining his endeavors to awaken us from our political lethargy; then, fir, my propofition is proved, and your reafoning falls to the ground.'

THIS difcourfe furnished matter of much reflection to the company; fome objections were made; fome doubts were propofed; and fome explanations asked for. I shall not trouble you with all these particulars, but shall conclude my letter, by relating to you in what manner the old gentleman replied, and by his reply wound up the conversation of the evening.

I believe, gentlemen, faid he, that we do not differ fo much as fome of you feem to imagine: for firft, tho' I defire the veffel of the commonwealth may fail fafely, yet I defire it may fail fmoothly too; and tho' I muft think, till I hear better reafons to the contrary, that public liberty cannot be fo eafily attacked, and may be more eafily defended, defended, in a perfect democracy, or in a mixed republic, than in a limited monarchy; yet will it not follow neceffarily from hence, as has been fuppofed, that I prefer the two firft to the laft of thefe forms of government. On either fide there are compenfations; and if liberty may be better defended in the former, yet ftill it may be defended, and domeftic quiet is perhaps better preferved in the latter.

' SECONDLY, if I agree with the gentlemen who have in-' fifted fo much on the little reafon which there was in the ' late reign, or is in the prefent, to apprehend any en-' croachments from the crown on the British liberties; these ' gentlemen must, I think, agree with me likewife that this ' will not alter the cafe; fubvert what I have endeavored to ' eftablish; or derive any blame on those who have endeavored to revive that public fpirit of watchfulnefs over all vored to revive that public fpirit of watchfulnefs over all national interefts, which is the proper and true guardian of liberty, in an age when that public fpirit has more than begun to fink and die away. I hope there will be always men found to preach this doctrine in feafon and out of feafon, as the apoftles preached the gofpel; becaufe if this fairit is not heat all times in vicer, it may fail us ' this fpirit is not kept at all times in vigor, it may fail us 'at fome particular time, when we shall want to exert it ' moft. In great and immediate danger, the moft fluggifh ' centinel is alert; but furely they who, in times of appa-' rent fecurity, excite us to be upon our guard, do as real ' fervice as they who animate us to our defence when we ' are actually attacked; and the first is, in my opinion, ' that kind of fervice of which we fland the moft in need. ' I confess freely, that I should not apprehend fo much ' danger to liberty in times of fuspicion, if I faw that neither ' power could fubdue, nor artifice divert, nor pufilanimity 'oblige men to abandon this fpirit; as I should apprehend ' in times of apparent fecurity, if I observed it to be loft. · In

• In a word, no laws, no orders of government can ef-• fectually fecure liberty any longer than this fpirit prevails, • and gives them vigor; and therefore you might argue as • reafonably for repealing any law, or abolifhing any cuftom, • the moft advantageous to liberty, and which you cannot be • fure of reftoring at your pleafure, becaufe you feel no im-• mediate want of it; as you have argued for letting this • fpirit die away, which you cannot be fure of reviving at • your pleafure, becaufe you perceive no immediate occafion • for the exercife of it.

LETTER II.

SIR,

HE fame company hath met, and the fame fubject hath been refumed; fo that I think myfelf under an obligation of writing to you again.

THE perfon who gave occafion to all that was faid in your defence the other day, feemed very defirous that the converfation fhould be purfued at our laft meeting; and therefore as foon as we fate down, he addreffed himfelf thus to the old gentleman who had fought your battle.

"' SIR, faid he, I own myfelf a good deal reconciled to the · Craftsman by the discourse you held, when we were last to-' gether. That fome inconveniencies must follow from keep-'ing this fpirit of jealoufy and watchfulnefs always alive, ' feems to me very evident; but I begin to think that this ' evil may be neceffary, in order to fecure us against greater. · Every fystem of human invention must be liable to fome ' objections; and it would be chimerical in us to expect a form of government liable to none. Even theocracy was ' attended by fome real inconveniencies, according to the ' Jewish histories; and neither the divine presence in the ' tabernacle, nor the ambulant oracle, which the prieft car-' ried about with him, could preferve intire purity in re-' ligion, or good order in the ftate. We must be content ' therefore to bear the diforder I apprehend from that fer-' ment, which a perpetual jealoufy of the governors in the ' governed will keep up, rather than abandon that spirit, ' the life of which is the life of liberty. When the jealoufy · happens happens to be ill-placed, we may hope it will not rife to any great and dangerous height. When it happens to be well grounded, it may have the good effect of deftroying a wicked minifter, of checking a bad, or of reclaiming a mifguided prince.

'You fee, fir, that my conversion is pretty far advanced; 'and if you will pleafe to defcend into particular applica-'tions of the general doctrines you delivered, as you gave 'us reafon to hope that you would, it is very probable that 'the few doubts I have ftill may be removed.

THE reft of the company feconded this requeft. The good old gentleman yielded to our common defires, and fpoke to the following effect:

• ONE is this: that the fpirit of liberty, far from infpiring • that rafhnefs and undiftinguifhing fury which are peculiar • to the fpirit of faction, is flow to act even againft the worft • princes, and exerts itfelf in favour of the beft with more • effect than any other fpirit whatever.

• THE fecond is this: that how flowly foever the fpirit of • liberty may act in fufpicious times and againft incroaching • governors; yet if it be kept alive, it will act effectually • fooner or later, tho' under the greateft difadvantages, and • againft the moft powerful opposition; in a word, in the • moft defperate cafes.

• THE first of these truths will recommend this spirit • to every good prince and honest minister. The other • will encourage every man who is a friend to liberty, never • to abandon the cause through despondency of success, as • long as he sees this spirit prevail, or even subsist.

'HAVING fixed these principal points of view, let us proceed: and tho' I would not advise you to admit the 'works of MACHIAVEL into your canon of political writ-'ings; yet fince in them, as in other apocryphal books, 'many excellent things are interspersed, let us begin by 'improving an hint taken from the discourses of the Ita-'lian fecretary on the first decade of Livy.

'HE observes that, of all governments, those are the 'best, which by the natural effect of their original confitutions are frequently renewed or drawn back, as he explains his meaning, to their first principles; and that no government can be of a long duration, where this does not happen from time to time, either from the cause just mentioned, or from some accidental cause.

THE reafon is obvious. There must be fome good in the first principles of every government, or it could not fubfist at all; much lefs could it make any progress. But this good degenerates, according to the natural course of things; and Vol. I. P p 'govern-

' governments, like other mixed bodies, tend to diffolution ' by the changes which are wrought in the feveral parts, and ' by the unaptnefs and difproportion, which refult from thence throughout the whole composition.

'But not to dwell on fuch examples, as point out to us 'rather the punishment of vice, than the means of refor-'mation, let us observe that this change, or renewal of the 'flate, is oftener and better wrought by internal caufes.

' MANY excellent inflitutions were contrived in framing the ' Roman government, which ferved to maintain in force the first principles of that political fystem. Such were the regulations about elections; the laws against bribery; and many other written laws, or confirmed customs. Such again was ' the the conflictution of the fenate, in whom the majefty of the commonwealth refided, and whofe authority controled the licentioufnefs of the people. Such was the erection of that facred, tribunitial power, whofe prerogatives ferved to check the ufurpations of the magiftrates, and who could arreft with one word, even the proceedings of the fenate. Such was the office of the cenfors, whofe inquifitions and luftrations corrected abufes, reformed manners, and purged the fenate itfelf of corrupt and unworthy members.

<sup>6</sup> THESE laws, thefe cuftoms, thefe different orders, con-<sup>6</sup> trouling one another, and promoting the general good of the <sup>6</sup> commonwealth, had great effect during fome centuries. <sup>6</sup> But this effect could never have followed them at all, <sup>6</sup> if the fpirit of liberty, which had enacted thefe laws, <sup>6</sup> eftablifhed thefe cuftoms, and formed thefe orders, had <sup>6</sup> not continued. The very beft laws are a dead letter, <sup>6</sup> nay often a grievance, unlefs they are ftrenuoufly and ho-<sup>6</sup> neftly executed. They never can be fo executed, unlefs <sup>6</sup> the fpirit of them poffefs thofe to whom the execution of <sup>6</sup> them is committed; and it would be ridiculous to ex-<sup>6</sup> pect to find this fpirit in the magiftrates, and the fe-<sup>6</sup> veral orders of the ftate, unlefs it appeared in the body <sup>6</sup> of the people, out of whom thefe magiftrates are chofen, <sup>6</sup> and thefe orders compofed.

THE examples which MACHIAVEL cites to fhew, that the virtue of particular men among the Romans, did frequently draw that government back to it's original principles, are fo many proofs that the duration of liberty depends on keeping the fpirit of it alive and warm. Such examples were frequent in Rome, whilft this fpirit flourifhed. As it decayed, thefe examples became more rare, and failed at laft entirely. The old laws and cuftoms were, for the moft part, ftill in being.

making their grandeur and glory confift, as they formerly had done, in that which the grandeur and glory of the commonwealth reflected on them, confidered themfelves now as individuals, not as citizens, and each would fhine with his own light. To this purpofe alone they employed the commands they had of armies, the governments of provinces, and the influence they acquired over the tribes at Rome, and over the allies and fubjects of the republic. Upon principles of the fame kind, inferior perfons attached themfelves to thefe; and that zeal and induftry, nay that courage and magnanimity, which had been exerted formerly in the fervice of the commonwealth, were exerted by the fpirit of faction, for MARIUS, or SYLLA; for CÆSAR, or POMPEY.

' IT is plain, that the liberty of Rome would not have been
' irretrievably loft, tho' CÆSAR had finished the civil war with
' abfolute fucces, and was settled in power, if the spirit of li' berty had not been then loft in the whole body of the people;
' if the Romans had not been as ripe for flavery, as the Cap' padocians were fond of it; for I think the Cappadocians
' were the people who defired that a prince might be set over
' them, and refused to be a free people.

I CANNOT believe that those who murdered CÆSAR, took.
fuch puerile measures as CTCERO, who was not let into the fecret, pretended that they had taken, when he faw the confequences of their action. But in this they erred. They killed their benefactor; at least, he was such to the greatest part of them; and renewed the civil war, in order to reftore liberty to a people, who had lost the fpirit of liberty, and who would not take it when it was offered to them. Even in the fenate, OCTAVIUS had a party; ANTHONY had a party; but the commonwealth had none. In short, the freest people upon earth, by fuffering the fpirit of liberty to decay, and that of faction to grow up, became flaves to fuch a fucceffion of monfters, continued with very few exceptions from the reign of AUGUSTUS to the deftruction of the empire, as God never fent in his wrath to execute vengeance on any other nation.
' upon

' IF now we bring thefe confiderations'home, we fhall find
' not only the first general proposition, but the others relative ' to it, illustrated and confirmed through the whole course of ' our annals. I shall make a deduction of some of these par' ticulars. To deduce them all would exceed my strength and
' your patience.'

HERE one of our company interrupted the old gentleman's difcourfe, by faying that fince we were come to a kind of paufe, he defired leave to make an obfervation, which he thought pertinent and material, on what had been faid, before we went into any new matter.---- 'The difference and oppofition ' between a fpirit of liberty and a fpirit of faction, continued ' he, hath been juftly flated. A fpirit of liberty will be al-' ways and wholly concerned about national interefts, and very ' indifferent about perfonal and private interefts. On the con-' trary, trary, a fpirit of faction will be always and wholly concerned about thefe, and very indifferent about the others. When they appear therefore in their proper characters, they are diftinguifhed as eafily as light and darknefs; and the danger

' Bur faction puts on the mask of liberty; and under this: ' false appearance, disputes her being even with liberty herself. ' Now here, methinks, a great many dangers arife ; the dan-' ger of mistaking when it is so hard to distinguish; the dan-' ger of being bubbles and tools of faction, whilft we fancy 'ourfelves affertors of public liberty; the danger of conti-' nuing under this delufion, till it is too late to prevent fuch " mifchiefs as we never intended to bring on our country. The ' fpirit of faction may take, and I doubt not hath often ' taken possession of numbers, who meant to entertain no-" other spirit than that of liberty; for numbers have not the ' difcernment of spirits. This possession may continue, and ' in fact, I believe it hath continued very often, till faction. ' hath accomplished, or fecured the accomplishment of her ends. I made this observation, which refults naturally from what hath been faid, and infift upon it, becaufe if. · faction could not lie latent under the most specious and po---' pular pretences imaginable, there would be no great need: ' of putting us on our guard against it; and because if it * can lie thus latent and concealed, we may be exposed to. ' the dangers I have mentioned, which fide foever of the <sup>e</sup> question we take in political disputes. At this time, to, " speak as I think, the case is so clear on one fide, that not " man who adheres to it, hath the leaft pretence left him to. ' fay that he purfues the public intereft, or is directed in his. ' conduct by the generous, difinterefted fpirit of liberty.

.4. I. COULDE

• I COULD fupport my affertion by many proofs, if it was • neceffary in this company. One I will mention for it's fin-• gularity; and it is this.

' THE dependence of the legislative on the executive power 4 hath been contended for by the fame perfons, under the fame ' direction; and yet nothing furely can be more evident than ' this; that in a conftitution like ours, the fafety of the " whole depends on the ballance of the parts, and the ballance ' of the parts on their mutual independency on one another : ' agreeably to which THUANUS makes FERDINAND fay, in an-' fwer to the Castilians, who preffed him to take away the ' independency of the flates of Arragon ; " Æquilibrio po-" tentiae regni regisque salutem publicam contineri; & si " contingeret aliquando alterum alteri praeponderare, pro-" culdubio alterius aut utriusque ruinam ex eo secuturam; "that the public fafety depends on the equal ballance of the power of the king, and of the power of the king-" dom; and that if ever it should happen that one out-"weighed the other, the ruin of one, or of both, muft " undoubtedly follow."

HISTORY OF ENGLAND. 297

'On one fide then the mask is pulled off. The weak ' may be feduced to concur; the ftrongest may be forced ' to fubmit; but no man can be any longer deceived.

' ON the other, it must be acknowledged that the appear-' ances are extremely fair.' True notions of liberty and good ' government are profeffed and purfued. Our grievances are ' complained of; our dangers are foretold; not only those ' which all men feel or fee, but those which are more re-' mote from obfervation. In fhort, the fpirit of liberty, ' fuch as it hath been defcribed, feems to breathe from this ' quarter, and to diffuse its influences over the nation.

' As I am a lover of my country and of liberty, I have 'rejoiced in this. I rejoice in it still; and yet I confess ' freely, that I took fome umbrage at a paper, which came 'out not long ago. The defign and tendency of it feemed ' to me to favor the cause of a faction; and of a faction, ' however contemptible in its prefent state, always to be 'guarded against. The paper I mean is Fog's Journal of the fixth of June; where you have feen a ridiculous ' fpeech, fuppofed to be made by general MONK, and tranf-' lated, as the author fays, from LETI's hiftory of OLIVER · CROMWELL.

' IF this wretched production had appeared in MIST'S ' Journal, I should have felt neither furprize nor concern. ' That writer never wore fo much as the mask of liberty; ' and fhewed his game fo plainly, that whatever he got by ' faction, faction could get nothing by him. But Fog, who ' writes incomparably better, hath appeared to write with ' a much better defign. Those who are warmest in the na-' tional interest, without regard to perfons, and indepen-' dently of all factions, have made this judgment of him; VOL. I. ' and Qq

' and therefore I was furprifed and concerned to find that ' he expofed himfelf even once, or in any degree, to the ' fame reproach that was frequently and juftly made to his ' predeceffor.'

THE gentleman's obfervation gave occafion to much difcourfe. Our old fage defired it might be remembered that he had not undertaken the defence of every weekly writer, tho' he had undertaken yours, Mr. D'ANVERS. ' The paper, ' continued he, which hath been fo much mentioned, is a ' very filly paper, to whatever purpofe it was defigned.

' IF it was defigned for more modern application, and to raife a fpirit amongft us in favor of the pretender, the project was too foolifh to have been hatched at home. It muft have been imported from abroad. What jacobite can be fanguine enough to hope that his caufe fhould revive, when he beholds the heroical king and queen, who fill our throne, aufpicious parents of a numerous progeny of young heroes and heroines, rifing up to emulate their virtues, and to gladden, like them, the Britifh nation.

'IN fhort, I perfuade myfelf that if the pretender had no rival in the throne, inftead of having there one fo formidable as our moft august monarch, yet his way to the throne would not be more open to him. The whole bulk of the people hath been brought by the revolution, and by the prefent fettlement of the crown, to entertain principles which very few of us defended in my younger days. The fafety and welfare of the nation

• are now the first and principal objects of regard. The re-• gard to perfons and to families hath been reduced to the fe-• cond place; and it holds even that but under the drection • of the former. Can any man believe that a people brave • enough to difpofe of their crown for the greatest na-• tional advantage, even when the throne was full, will • ever difpofe of it as long as the fpirit of liberty remains • amongst them, for the greatest national mischief, if the • throne should be empty?

' THERE is but one defign more, which I can conceive to ' have given occasion to this filly paper; but one quarter ' more, from which it could poffibly come : and thefe 'guesses, perhaps, will not appear the least probable. . Might it not be defigned to inftil a jealoufy of jacobitifm, ' and to prejudice mankind against all writings which those ' who are offended at them cannot answer ?---Might it not ' be defigned to furnish the spruce, pert orator, who strewed fome of his flowers in the Daily Courant of the eleventh ' of June, with an hint, which he hath most happily and ' modeftly improved ? " Fog, fays he, avows jacobitism; " the Craftfman concurs in the fame defign; nay, every " jacobite in England finks his mafter's divine right in the " popular topics of debts, taxes and corruption." So that ' jacobitism may now be imputed upon this authority, to ' ninety-nine in an hundred of the whole nation; for ninety-' nine in an hundred do complain of debts, taxes and cor-'ruption. I am fure there is arrogance and impertinence ' both in fuch an infinuation too grofs to be denied; whereas ' the Craftsman may destroy the whole proof brought against ' him of arrogance, by answering three filly questions in ' the negative.

HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

' IF this was the defign, I will be bold, for bold it may ' juftly feem, to fay that this expedient is, at leaft, as bung-' ling and likely to prove as ineffectual, as any that have ' been produced by the fame great genius who contrived it; ' for if we were inclined to believe that the Craftfman, Fog, ' or any other perfon, carries on the meafures of faction ' under the mafk of liberty; fhould we believe it on the ' credit of thofe who oppofe them, and who are notori-' oufly influenced to write, tho' under fpecious pretences ' of promoting loyalty to the king, and an acquiefcence ' in his majefty's meafures, yet in reality, for no other ' fervice than that of a fmall number of men; nay, flrictly ' fpeaking, of a fingle man? With what face can fuch ' writers impute faction to any one living or dead?

<sup>6</sup> LET them be affured that we can examine and judge for <sup>6</sup> ourfelves; and that neither the Craftfman nor Fog would <sup>6</sup> be able, if they went about it, to impose upon us, any <sup>6</sup> more than they themselves have been able to do.

THE pretty author, I juft now mentioned, begins his effay with airs of wit, and ends it with airs of wifdom.
What pity is it that he fhould fucceed in neither? In his firft paragraph he reprefents the Craftfman, with curious impropriety, as a magician, who conjures up fpirits; as a dog, who barks at a diffance; as a little infect, who nibbles at a character: and my friend CALEB was all thefe things, it feems, at the fame inftant. After this fpecimen of writing, we may expect to fee him compared, in fome other production of the fame author, to a bird, and made to fly different ways and in different places at once.

'But let us leave the wit and come to the wifdom; which 'will bring us back to our fubject.

· IN

' IN the laft paragraph of this elaborate piece, the author fets the example of my lord FALKLAND and others before our eyes; who ftrengthened, as he fays, the republican party fo long, "that when they found out their defigns and forfook them, it was too late to prevent them." After this, he calls most charitably on feveral well-meaning perfons to take warning; for fome, whom he allows to be fuch, he thinks in danger of being drawn in to favor the purposes of those whom he calls opposers of our government.

"BEHOLD this little GAMALIEL in cathedra! Obferve the cholars he places at his feet for inftruction! "Rifum teneatis amici?" Can the gravest of you forbear laughter?

fpeak more fully upon it hereafter, becaufe I perceive that we are apt to confine our idea of faction to fuch men and fuch meafures, as are in oppofition to the men in power, and to the meafures they take; whereas in truth a number of men in power, who exercife it folely for their own private advantage and fecurity, and who treat the nation as their farm, or rather as a country under contribution to them, let them fhelter themfelves under what authority they pleafe, are as much a faction, as any number of men, who under popular pretences endeavor to ruin, or at leaft to difturb the government, that they may raife themfelves.

' IF the fpirit of liberty were extinguished, as it is dif-' couraged, the fpirit of fome faction or other would, no ' doubt, prevail; but this would not fucceed under the mask ' of liberty. There would be, in fuch a cafe, no need of ' wearing this difguise. Men would avow faction. They ' would chuse that which fuited their interest best; and in-' deed it would be of no great moment which they chose.

I fee therefore no caufe to fear that we may be drawn in to ferve the purpofes of faction, whilft we purfue the caufe of liberty; and if we fuffered ourfelves to be drawn off from this purfuit by the jealoufy which one faction endeavors to give us of another, we fhould be arrant bubbles indeed. Fog is not to be defended for publifhing a paper liable every way to blame, and capable of no excufe; but if he hath hurt any body by it, he hath hurt himfelf; and the weight which is laid upon it by those on one fide, who perhaps writ it, is as ridiculous as the project of those who thought to advance the jacobite cause by it, if it came from that fide.'

HERE the old gentleman broke off, and tho' he was prefied to refume the difcourfe he had begun, when this interruption happened, he defired to be excufed, becaufe it was late, and promifed to comply with our requeft upon fome other occafion. If he keeps his word, as I am perfuaded he will, you shall hear again from,

LETTER III.

SIR,

OUR old gentleman having kept his word with the company, I defigned to have kept mine with you; but fome bufinefs calling me into the country, I fend you a few minutes of the converfations which have paffed, in hopes that the fubject will not be left imperfect for as long a time as my affairs may oblige me to be abfent. Throw thefe minutes into what form and make what ufe of them you pleafe. They are defigned to ferve an honeft caufe; the caufe of truth and of liberty. You have efpoufed it; and I hope will purfue it.

You are able to do this with fuccefs, even in opposition to the most plaufible writers; and how much more against the curfory observator, who appeared in the Daily Courant, and the London Journalist?

I Do not fuppofe you will think it worth your while to fet ferioufly about anfwering them; but it may be worth while now and then to fhew them how little they deferve to be anfwered.

THEY complain heavily of the prolixity and dulnefs of the letters which you have published. Might they not be taught, what they have already taught the world, that an effay of two or three columns may be longer than an effay of five or fix? Let them not carp at my words, fince they cannot mistake my meaning.

MIGHT they not be convinced that they are the leaft competent judges in the whole nation, of the dulnefs of others, for this plain reafon: that it is not in the cafe of dulnefs, as it is in that of wit and learning; in which he is the beft judge of thefe qualities in others, who possifies them himfelf in the most eminent degree?

BUT there is a judge, before whom all productions of this fort are tried, and by whofe fentence alone they muft ftand, or fall. This judge is the public; and I am apt to think that thefe authors may be informed of the fentence pronounced by the public on your papers, Mr. D'ANVERS, and on their own, if they will take the trouble to enquire of Meffieurs ROBERTS, PEELE, and FRANCKLIN.

I AM even inclined to believe that they have enquired; and that, defpairing of fuccefs before this tribunal, they have appealed to another, where those whom the public rejects, are pretty fure of being received.

SURE I am that they cannot hope to fucceed any where elfe, whilft they found their merit on Billingfgate, falfe quotations, grofs mifreprefentations, and an eternal begging of the queftion.

THAT they are guilty of all thefe may be foon proved. I will point out fome inftances; as many as the hafte I am in allows me time to mention.

THE Curfory Observator accuses you and me (for these writers are pleafed to suppose us to be the fame perfon who corresponds with himself) of quoting falsely and applying foolifhly in every case, whils he quotes falsely himself, and ridicules the appli-application of what it is manifest he never read. His whole charge is built on a lie and a blunder.

MACHIAVEL is made, according to him, in one of my letters, to fuppofe " that the first destruction of Rome by the " Gauls (and I never heard of a fccond) was a judgment from " heaven on the people for their having departed from their " antient observances and religious ceremonies."---With this he makes himself wonderfully merry; and having heard that MACHIAVEL did not pass for a very strong believer, he ridicules. the imputation of such a supposition to that great politician.

But let this fcribbler learn to read, before he blots any more paper. Let him learn to fpeak of what is, or is not in books, after he hath looked into those books, and not from his idle imagination of what an author would, or would not have faid, agreeably to the character of the author, which his ignorance hath taken upon truft.

My old gentleman never faid that MACHIAVEL fuppofed the deftruction of Rome by the Gauls was a judgment from heaven; but he reckoned, amongft other particulars in which the Romans had begun to degenerate, and to which they were brought back by this great misfortune, that of neglecting the ceremonics of religion and the laws of juffice. Now MA-CHIAVEL does fay this in express and ftrong terms, as this writer would have known, if he had confulted the first chapter of the third book of his difcours on LIVY.

BUT I will tell him fomething more. This very MA-CHIAVEL * hath written a whole chapter concerning the religion of the Romans; in which he mentions that Rome

was more obliged to NUMA than to ROMULUS; in which he fhews that her grandeur and felicity were owing to her religion; nay, he afferts in general, that as religion raifes commonwealths, fo the contempt of it muft ruin them. "Good Gods! is this talking like MACHIAVEL?"----Why truly it is thus that MACHIAVEL talks; and in talking thus he fhews more learning and fenfe than the Obfervator is mafter of.

CAST your eye, Mr. D'ANVERS, on the next paragraph; in which this able perfon undertakes to prove from reafon, as well as hiftory, a matter of fact. The fact is this: that the deftruction of Rome by the Gauls, was owing to the oppofition fet on foot to the measures and perfon of the great and much injured CAMILLUS.

IT was a great mistake, it seems, to mention this incident in the Roman history, in one of my letters. The Observator shall find that it was a greater blunder in him to dwell upon it.

HE knows as little of LIVY as he does of MACHIAVEL, or I believe of any other good author. Let him turn to the Roman hiftorian. He will find that LIVY, in the transition which he makes from the profecution of CAMILLUS to the invalue of the Gauls, fays " that if there be any thing cer-" tain in human affairs, Rome could not have been taken, if " that citizen had remained in it." But does he attribute the invalue of the Gauls to this man's banifhment? No. He attributes it to the conduct of three rafh and foolifh brothers, who were fent ambafiadors to the Gauls, and who, by breaking the law of nations, juftly provoked this people. He attributes it to the force of a faction, which prevailed to fcreen thefe criminals, and expofed the flate to ruin, rather than give them up to juffice.

THUS the fact ftands in hiftory. Let the Observator now confider whether it would be very difficult to make certain applications of it, which he would not like. I doubt these applications would appear much more apposite than that which is faid to be intended in his paper, of the character of the great and much injured CAMILLUS.

HE fucceeds, you fee, but ill, when he meddles with facts; and I do not find that he pretends much to reafon. The reft of his paper contains little more than fool, knave, libeller, incendiary, &c. I fhall therefore take notice of but one thing more; and that is the advantage he would make of a miftake in printing.

HE must have perceived, or he can perceive nothing, that it was a mistake in printing. If the meaning of my letter had been, that the Crastsfman might destroy the whole proof of arrogance brought against him, by answering in the negative all the questions asked in the paragraph referred to, it should have been faid "five filly questions;" for they are five, not four; but the truth is, that no regard was had to the two introductory questions; and that the three main questions which follow, were alone meant. A writer must be reduced very low, by his cause, or be very low in his character, who catches at such an impertinent opportunity of being what he imagines fmart.

- I fhould fay a word or two to the profound Mr. OSBORNE, who hath been pleafed to let us know that he prefers the abfolute monarchy of AUGUSTUS to the free flate of the Romancommonwealth. He prefers likewife, I fuppofe, at leaft his difcourfe leads one to think fo, the violence, the treachery, and the bloody maffacrees, on which this abfolute monarchy was founded, to the civil diforders, which were occafioned by eftablifheftablishing and maintaining an equal commonwealth. I should defire him to compare the reigns of a CALIGULA, a NERO, a DOMITIAN, an HELIOGABALUS, which had never happened, if the ufurpation of Augustus had never happened, with the glorious fourth and fifth centuries of the republic of Rome; but I have not, at prefent, time for this. I hope you, Mr. D'ANVERS, will give him fome falutary correction at your leifure, and make him ashamed of having prophaned the language of a free people in fo proftitute a manner, and to fuch flavish purposes! Advise him to learn better notions of government from Mr. GORDON's excellent discourses, prefixed to his translation of TACITUS; in which he will find his favorite Augustus fet in a true light, and proved to be an infamous tyrant, tho' fomewhat more artful than his fucceffors. He must certainly acknowledge the obligation; fince you cannot be fuspected of doing it onany account, but that of a charitable difpofition towards him. If he was capable of imposing on the dullest Quidnunc in any coffee-house, or of seducing the most raw boy that ever eloped from school, you might be suspected of some farther and deeper defign; but when you write against fo harmless a creature, your efforts must pass, and ought to país, for the pure effects of the most difinterested, the most refined charity.

LET me only afk the favor of you to touch three points, amongft others, whenever you condefcend to meddle with fquire OSBORNE. One is to affure him in my name, and, if you pleafe, in your own, that a good minifter ought not tobe abufed; nay more, that he who abufes him, is a rogue, a. rafcal, and an impudent (I had almost faid, for I conform to his dialect, a traiterous) fellow; and might have justified myfelf by the authority of a writer on Mr. OSBORNE's fide, who talked of allegiance to ministers: but let this important author thor know, at the fame time, that we defy him to make the leaft use of these concessions against any one sentence, any one word in any Craftsman that hath been published.

THERE are two other things, of which I defire you likewife to take notice. One is fcandaloufly impudent; the other infamoufly unfair.

WHEN his patron is commended by any honeft man in Britain, it is done most certainly with a fneer. The "great man" is an expression, which hath undoubtedly occasioned more fneers than this nation had feen in a century before; but it is faucy and impudent in Mr. OSBORNE to suppose that one, who speaks of the king and royal family with all the respect that is due to them, means a fneer.

THE other thing, which I defire you to take notice of, is the malicious and mean comment made on an expression in my last letter to you, where I called his present majesty a formidable rival of the pretender. Mr. OSBORNE is pleased, out of the abundance of his loyalty, to refent this as an infult on the king. Now tho', in strictness of fact and propriety of language, his majesty neither is a rival to any body, nor can have a rival, being our rightful and lawful king, by the confent of his people in parliament, the only good title to the crown of these realms; yet in pretension there is a rivalry; and I may defy Mr. OSBORNE to give any other reason for keeping up to large an army in times of peace.

You will observe, Mr. D'ANVERS, that the only defign of this letter is to make fome short observations on two filly papers which have been published against my former letters to you.

you. You are now defired to apply the old gentleman's general pofitions to the English history, from the minutes which I have fent you, and which I believe will be as agreeable to the public, as it was to the company in which he delivered it.

ON THE

LETTER IV.

EW nations have gone through more revolutions, few governments have appeared more unfleady, or fluctuated more between prerogative and privilege, than this of Great Britain.

IF we are freemen, it is because the spirit of liberty has been never yet quite extinguished among us.

J (15)

WE have been furprifed, betrayed, forced, more than once, into fituations little better than that of downright flavery. But thefe ufurpations have not become fettlements. They have difordered the frame, but not deftroyed the principles of a free government. Like cloudy mornings, they have foon paffed over, and the fun of liberty has broke out again with double force, and double luftre.

IT must be a pleafure to reflect on that uniformity of fpirit which created, and has constantly preferved or retrieved, the original freedom of the British and Saxon constitutions. • Vol. I. S. f. I FEEL I FEEL a fecret pride in thinking that I was born a Briton; when I confider that the Romans, those masters of the world, maintained their liberty little more than feven centuries; and that Britain, which was a free nation above feventeen hundred years ago, is fo at this hour.

HOWEVER favage our British ancestors may be reprefented by the Romans, whom the luxury of Greece, and the effeminacy of Asia had already corrupted, they certainly were a people of spirit and of fense; who knew the ends of government, and obliged their governors to pursue those ends.

CÆSAR himfelf acknowledges that they fought boldly for their liberties, when he invaded them; and there is good reafon to believe, from his manner of writing, and abrupt way of leaving this ifland, that they gave him a warmer reception than he is willing to own.

BUT to fpeak of them after an author, in whofe time they were better known than they were by CÆSAR, or even by TACITUS; DION CASSIUS, when he is about to relate the expedition of SEVERUS into Britain, fays " that " they held a great part of the government in their own " power."

THEIR long refiftance against the Saxons shews their love of civil liberty.

THEIR long refiftance against the usurpations of the church of Rome, begun by GREGORY, that flatterer of PHOCAS and BRUNEHAULT, under pretence of converting the Saxons, shews their love of ecclesiaftical liberty.

HISTORY OF ENGLAND. 315

THO' the Saxons fubmitted to the yoke of Rome, in matters of religion, they were far from giving up the freedom of their Gothic inftitutions of government.

THE Saxon heretoges, that is, public generals, were chosen only to conduct them in war, not to rule over them in war and in peace.

THESE heretoges, among the German colonies, who fettled in the countries they conquered, and founded new governments, became kings, and had trappings enough to fet off their majefty, and to enforce their authority; but the fupreme power centered in the micklemote, or wittagenmote, composed of the king, the lords, and the Saxon freemen, that original fketch of a British parliament.

HERE all important affairs were treated. The conduct of their kings was examined in it, and controuled by it.

THE rights of the people in those days, must have been: carried to a very great height; fince they went hand in hand' with those of the church; and fince a positive law declared that if the king did not defend both, he should lose even the name of king. " Nec nomen regis in eo constabit, " verum nomen regis perdit."

THE principles of the Saxon commonwealth were therefore very democratical; and these principles prevailed through. all subsequent changes.

THE Danes conquered the crown, but they wore it little; and the liberties of the Saxon freemen they never conquered; nor wrought any alteration in the conftitution. of the government.

316 REMARKS ON THE

THUS much it was thought neceffary to premife, concerning the original conflictution of our government. We now come to that period of hiftory, from whence we propose to deduce our following remarks.

WILLIAM, the Norman, is come down to us in hiftory under the character of a conqueror; and tho' it may be difputed whether he was ftrictly fo any more than feveral other princes who have fupported their titles by their fwords, yet we may confefs that he impofed many new laws and cuftoms; that he made very great alterations in the whole model of government; and that he, as well as his two fons, ruled, upon many occafions, like abfolute, not limited monarchs.

YET neither he nor they could deftroy the old conftitution; becaufe neither he nor they could extinguish the old spirit of liberty.

 $_{\rm o}$  O<sub>N</sub> the contrary, the Normans and other ftrangers, who fettled here, were foon feized with it themfelves, inflead of infpiring a fpirit of flavery into the Saxons.

THEY were originally of * Celtic, or Gothic extraction, call it which you pleafe, as well as the people they fubdued. They came out of the fame northern hive; and therefore they naturally refumed the fpirit of their anceftors, when they came into a country where it prevailed.

* We have thought fit to explain the expression in this place, tho' we know the word Celtic, as well as Scythian, hath been used in the fame large and general fense, which is made use of here; and we could shew, if such a trifle deferved it, that by the Celtae antiquity did not always understand the people inhabiting a part of Gaul, notwithstanding the quotations out of POLYBIUS, DIODORUS, &c. which have been urged, by way of cavil, against us.

STEPHEN, the fourth king of this race, owed his crown to the good-will of the nation; and he owed this good-will to the conceffions he made in favor of liberty.

JOHN came to the crown after the death of his father HENRY the fecond, and his brother RICHARD the first, by the election of the people. His electors, indeed, found themfelves deceived in their expectations; for he governed in the most extravagant manner. But they foon made him feel whose creature he was. The contest between the laity and an ambitious usurping clergy ran very high at this time. JOHN had made his advantage of these divisions. But the spirit of liberty prevailed, and that of faction vanished before it. Men grew assured at the tools of private ambition, when public fastery was at stake. Those of the high church and those of the low church united in one common cause. The king blustered and drew out his army; but it was a British army. No wonder therefore, if the king fubmitted, and Magna charta was figned.

IT was figned again by his fon and fucceffor, HENRY the third, in full parliament, and with the greateft folemnity. The people however abated nothing of their jealous, watchful fpirit; and it was well for liberty they did not. The long reign of this prince was one continual flruggle between him and them. The iffue of this flruggle was favorable to the latter. By exerting their flrength, they encreafed it under HENRY the third. They loft no ground under EDWARD the firft, and they gained a great deal under EDWARD the fecond.

THUS was the prefent conflitution of our government forming itfelf for about two centuries and an half; a rough building raifed out of the demolitions which the Normans had made, made, and upon the folid foundations laid by the Saxons. The whole fabrick was cemented by the blood of our fathers; for the British liberties are not the grants of princes. They are original rights, conditions of original contracts, co-equal with prerogative, and co-æval with our government. As fuch, in the days we fpeak of, they were claimed; as fuch they were afferted by force of arms; as fuch they were ac-knowledged; and as fuch they were conftantly maintained afterwards by that pertinacious fpirit, which no difficulties nor dangers could difcourage, nor any authority abate; not even that of the pope, as impudently as it was exercifed, and as foolifhly as it was revered in those fuperstitious ages.

HAD this fpirit relaxed in the course of fo many years; our government must have fettled in an abfolute monarchy, or tyrannical ariftocracy.

THE Norman kings, of imperious tempers, affumed great power. The barons did the fame. The people groaned under the opprefilion of both. This union was unnatural and could not laft. The barons, enjoying a fort of feuda-tory fovereignty, were often partners and fometimes rivals. of the kings. They had opposite interests, and they foon classed.

Thus was the opportunity created of re-eftablishing a more equal free government than that which had prevailed after the Norman invation.

THE kings, the barons, and the clergy; not lefs ambitious or avaritious than either of the others, had powerful means of promoting their usurpations. The commonalty had little or no share in the legislature; made no figure in the government; ment; and it is hard to conceive how they could act, as the others might, and certainly did by particular concerts, to the advancement of their particular interefts.

ALL these difadvantages were fupplied by that fpirit of liberty, which diffused itself through the whole mass. Numbers were on the fide of the commons. In all disputes therefore it was necessary to apply to them. They made the proper use of such conjunctures. Whoever lost, they were fure to be gainers; for so they deemed themselves, when they fuffered all the hardships of war, and even laid down their lives in the quarrel, if they left liberty more improved and better fecured to their posterity.

By conceffions to the commons, our kings maintained and extended their prerogatives over the barons. By efpoufing the national intereft, the barons continued able to cope with the crown, till they broke among themfelves. Nay, even the church, notwithftanding that antient and clofe alliance between fecular and ecclefiaftical tyranny, was forced, on fome few occasions, to be a friend to the liberties of the people.

THE king, the barons and the clergy were all, in reality, enemies to public liberty. Their party were fo many factions in the nation; yet they all helped, in their turns, to establish liberty.

So true it is, that every thing, even the vices of mankind, and the misfortunes of a country, will turn to the advantage of liberty, where the fpirit of it is maintained in vigor; as every thing, even the good qualities of mankind and the profperity of a country, may operate a contrary effect, where this fpirit is fuffered to decline. As lofing the fpirit of liberty loft the liberties of Rome, even while the laws and conflictutions, made for the prefervation of them, remained entire; fo we fee that our anceftors, by keeping this fpirit alive and warm, regained all the advantages of a free government, tho' a foreign invafion had deftroyed them, in great measure, and had imposed a very tyrannical yoke on the nation.

LETTER V.

WE are now come to the reign of EDWARD the third. We must defire our readers to stop here, and at the reign of his fucceffor a little; fince no reigns can furnish us with more memorable and pertinent examples, to shew how the spirit of liberty exerts itself in favor of good princes; how flow it is to act even against the worst; and yet how effectually it is able to act even in the most desperate cases.

OLD FROISSART fays, * that the Englifh had an opinion, grounded on obfervations made from the days of good king ARTHUR, that between two valiant and able princes in this nation, there always intervenes a king "moins fuffifant de fens "& de proueffe; of lefs fenfe and courage." I fhall not warrant the exact truth of this obfervation. The proportion, I fear, is much greater on the worft fide in all kingdoms. But certainly EDWARD the third, whofe ftory gave occafion to FROISSART to broach this anecdote, ftands between his father EDWARD the fecond, and his grandfon RICHARD the fecond, a bright inftance of this truth, that "great and good princes are "favorers of liberty, and find their account in promoting the "fpirit of it; whilft the weakeft and the worft princes chieffy "affect abfolute power, and often meet with the fate they de-"ferve for fuch attempts."

THE former know that they have nothing to apprehend from this fpirit; and they wifely prefer the generous efforts of good-will and affection to the reluctant compliances of fuch as obey by force.

VOL. I.

THE latter, confcious that they are unable to lead, endeavor to drive their people. Unworthy to be kings, they ftruggle to be tyrants.

FEW were the blemishes which may be thought to tarnish the lustre of this reign of EDWARD the third. Few and short were the struggles between him and his people; for as he was fierce and terrible to his enemies, he was amiable and indulgent to his subjects. He not only observed the laws, but he made the fense of the nation, in some measure, a law to him. On this principle, in which, to a confidering mind, there will appear as much wildom as goodness, he removed a son, nay a favorite mistress from court.

HENRY the fourth, if I miltake not, did fomething of the fame kind; and which of their fucceffors, after fuch examples, could prefume to think it below his dignity to confult the inclination of his people, and make them the rule of his conduct?

UNDER this great prince, the confliction of our parliaments, and the whole frame of our government became reduced into a better form. A fpirit of liberty breathes in the laws of this glorious king; and the power and duty of parliaments are fet forth, in fome of them, with fuch terms as would never have been paffed by a prince who had put the leaft pedantry, or the leaft foppery, into his notions of kingfhip.

THE fpirit of liberty was not idle in this reign, tho' it had little or no occafion of exercife against the crown. The usurpations of the church were many and grievous. They had been long murmured against; but a false respect for religion had hitherto maintained them. This delusion began now to be removed. WICKLIFFE arose to dispel this magic charm;

to undraw the veil of this pretended fanctuary; and to expose the horrors and trifles which lurked behind it, to public view, indignation and contempt. The ax was now first aimed at the root of popery; and prelates were taught the first leffons of moderation. Parliaments fat and proceeded on bufines, even on ecclesiastical bufines, without the intervention of mitres. There was, I believe, one parliament held, to which few or none of the prelates were fummoned; in order, perhaps, to teach them how little their concurrence was effential to give due weight to the counfels, or full authority to the acts of parliament.

As this prince loved, inftead of hating, as he encouraged, inftead of difcountenancing, the fpirit of liberty in his people; fo he was ftrengthened and fupported by it in fuch a manner, and in fuch circumftances as cannot be paralleled.

THE nation had been miferably harraffed by civil wars and oppreffions of various kinds, when he came to the crown. The burthen of perfonal fervice, and the taxes raifed to defend the dominions which his predeceffors held on the continent, had exhaufted all degrees of people. This mifchief was fo much refented by them, that foreign intereft and foreign counfels may be juftly reckoned among the principal caufes of all the difputes, and even wars, between them and their former kings.

In this fituation, and in this temper of mind was the nation, when EDWARD the third, by laying claim to the crown, and undertaking the conqueft of France, opened to his fubjects the terrible profpect of being worfe than ever opprefied by the fame grievances; and yet his nobility and commonalty feconded him in all thefe enterprizes, with fewer complaints than could have been expected. Thefe men, fo apt to complain of griev-T t 2 ances, and fo little patient under them, carried him triumphantly through all his wars abroad, tho' they ftruggled with want, peftilence and famine at home.

WHAT principle produced this wonderful change? Did higher notions of prerogative prevail? Had the doctrines of a flavifh fubmiflion at once poffeffed our anceftors? By no means. It was not the power, it was not the authority of the king, which forced; but it was the character of the man, which invited to these compliances. The fpirit of liberty exerted itself in favor of the patron of liberty.

A CORRUPT parliament, a degenerate nobility, a fervile commonalty, will facrifice any thing to any prince; to a Ri-CHARD the fecond, or an EDWARD the third, equally and indifcriminately. But a free, a generous, a virtuous people, fuch as we may boaft our anceftors were in those days, will facrifice every thing, except liberty, to a prince like EDWARD the third, and liberty is a facrifice which a prince like EDWARD the third, and liberty is a facrifice which a prince like him will never require at their hands. To him who would require it, they would facrifice nothing. Such a people may be well governed with eafe; and it ought to be hard to govern them ill. They will do more for a prince whom they love and effeem, than he has a right to expect from them. If they do lefs for a prince whom they defpife or hate, they are furely very excufable.

IN order to render this example flill ftronger and more ufeful, it may be proper to point out, befides his general character, fome of those particulars in the conduct of Edward the third, which probably induced his people to facrifice their effates, and their lives too, fo chearfully in a cause, to which, under other princes, they had been fo averse.

HISTORY OF ENGLAND. 325

In the first place, as his father EDWARD the fecond loft his crown and his life, in the most miferable manner, by fuffering himself to be governed by his ministers, and protecting them from the refertments of the people; fo his fon very early exerted his own authority, and freed himself from the guardianship, or rather subjection, of the queen and MORTIMER, who had long oppressed the nation, and disconced the young king by their scandalous conduct.

THE next reafon feems to have been this: Tho' he was magnificent in his court, yet he limited, with great care, the exactions of his purveyors, kept a fevere hand over them, and fuffered no more to be levied on his people, than what the neceffary expence of his houfhold required. He faved for his people, not for himfelf.

THIRDLY, The taxes laid in his time, were laid for vifible and important fervices, wherein the honor at leaft of the nation was concerned; which every man knew and approved.

FOURTHLY, The expences were leffened by that double aconomy, which is fo rarely found, or even underftood. I mean not only that inferior aconomy, which confifts in the management of the receipts and iffues of the public revenue; but that fuperior aconomy, which confifts in contriving the great fchemes of negotiation and action. When the talents for this aconomy are wanting in those who govern, the public pays for their want of genius; and the prince's, or minifter's errors, are fo many additional taxes on the people. When these talents are not wanting, the very reverse happens. The genius of the prince, or minister, comes in aid of the public charge. Much is faved; and art and management fupply it all. EDWARD the third began his war againft France, in conjunction with German allies. He faw no better expedient at that time. But as foon as fortune and intrigue had procured it for him, he took another, fhorter, cheaper, and more effectual method. He fupported the earl of MONFORT, competitor with CHARLES of Blois, for the dutchy of Brittany. "Avecques les Allemans, & les Brabançons, fays FROISSART, i il n'avoit riens fait, fors defpendre groffement; & l'avoit mené & demené les fiegneurs de l'empire, qui avoient prints fon or & fon argent, ainfy qu'ills avoient voulu, & riens fait. Si defcendit à la requefte du comte joyeufement, &c." That is, " with the Germans and the Brabançons, all he " had been able to do was to fpend great fums of money. " The princes of the empire, who had taken as much as " they would of his gold and his filver, and had done no-" thing for it, were accuftomed to amufe him, and to tire " him out. He condefcended therefore to the requeft of " the earl very joyfully."

FIFTHLY, It was not owing to his fuccefs that the people had a good opinion of his enterprizes, and promifed themfelves an happy iffue, how difficult, or dangerous foever thefe enterprizes might appear. Their confidence was placed, and very juftly, in thofe qualities, and that tenor of conduct, which they obferved in their king, and to which his prodigious fuccefs was owing. No man contrived, prepared, refolved with more phlegm, or acted with greater fire; the reverfe of his fucceffor, who refolved rafhly, and executed irrefolutely. He waited fometimes for opportunities, but he always improved them when they happened; and thofe accidents which govern or dictate the meafures, and perpetually fhift the fluctuating fchemes of weak governments, were bent by this great prince to ferve the wifeft and moft fteady purpofes.

SIXTHLY,

SIXTHLY, If he drained away fome of the national wealth by taxes, he reftored it very amply again, by the great care he took of extending and improving trade; by which he opened new mines of treasure ; and, for a few temporary contributions, enriched his people to future generations. A prince, who adds to the national flock, has a right to share the advantage he procures, and may demand fupplies from his people without blufhing. But a prince who lives a rentcharge on the nation he governs, who fits on his throne, like a monftrous drone in the middle of an hive, draining all the combs of their honey, and neither making nor affifting the industrious bees to make any; fuch a prince, I fay, ought to blush at every grant he receives from a people, who never received any benefit from him. The duke of GLOUCESTER told RICHARD the fecond, on his reftoring Breft to the duke of Brittany, that he should have taken a town by his own valor and conduct, before he refigned what his anceftors had left him. Much to the fame purpose might an oppressed people justly answer a craving prince. When you have increafed the riches and advanced the profperity of the nation, you will have fome right to make thefe demands upon us ; but till then we shall think that you have none.

* THE glorious fcene of government which difplayed itfelf in the reign of EDWARD the third, was ftrangely altered on the fucceflion of RICHARD the fecond; a violent, haughty, obftinate and weak prince; whofe reign, as one of our hiftorians obferves, "affords but little matter that may "fhine in hiftory; and cannot boaft of any one great and di-"ftinguifhed captain; any one memorable battle, or impor-"tant fiege; but prorogations of truces, abftinences, fuffer-"ances, patiences, tolerances were the language and amufe-"ment of the times; and treaties were all the while kept on "foot for a perpetual peace; treaties, fays he, hitherto fruit-"lefs, illufory and impracticable."

IT muft be confeffed that the reins of government hung pretty loofe in the hands of EDWARD the third, towards the latter end of his reign; from whence proceeded the growth of thofe factions which diffurbed the beginning of his grandfon's reign. Some part of this was owing, very probably, to the abufe of WICKLIFFE's doctrines; more to the cruel treatment which the inferior part of the commonalty received. The lords grew tyrants, and the commons rebels. But thefe commotions were foon fupprefied by the united force of the reft of the nation; much fooner, and with confequences lefs fatal than in other countries, where rebellion and popular infurrections feem to have been the epidemical diffempers of that age.

* Mr. FRANCKLIN was taken up for printing this paper and the preceding one, on the reign of EDWARD the third; but no farther profecution hath been yet commenced against him on that account.

IF the fpirit of faction was foon quelled among the commons, it prevailed openly, fcandaloufly, and dangeroufly in the court. Something of it might be difcerned, perhaps, among the lords, who oppofed the court; even in the duke of GLOUCESTER, the favorite of the people; in the duke of LANCASTER, a wife prince, and who acted long the moderating part; in ARUNDEL and others. Nothing of it was to be obferved in the general proceedings of parliament, and in the national conduct.

The juftnefs of the character given before of RICHARD the fecond, difcovered itfelf very early in his actions. He had a brutality and a good opinion of himfelf; one of which might have betrayed him into a difcovery of what it was his intereft to conceal, if the other had not made him capable of doing it, even on reflection. Hence came those famous and foolifh fayings of this prince, which history has preferved, and which gave his people timely warning what they had to expect from him. Of his commons he faid, " that " flaves they were, and flaves they should be." Upon an addrefs from parliament to remove his chancellor and treafurer, his answer was, " that he would not remove, at their " requeft, the meanest fcullion out of his kitchen."

HOWEVER, he found men, as all princes may eafily do, who flattered him in his vices and follies; fuch men, for inflance, as NEVIL, VERE, POOLF, TRESSILIAN, and others; who, to faften him to themfelves, made the nation odious to him; as they made him odious to the nation by their rapine, their infolence, and by a weak administration; which exposed the kingdom to be invaded by the Scots, and threatened and infulted by the French.

VOL. I.

DURING

DURING all this time, parliaments met frequently, and gave neceffary fupplies; fome grievances they redreffed; but bore the mal-administration of the court faction till the tenth year of this king; when they profecuted the favorites with great juffice; with temper, and yet with vigor. They fpared no-thing to provide for the defence of the kingdom by fea and land; and having put the administration, for a time, into the hands of perfons chosen by themselves, gave the king such a warning, as might have taught him to abandon a faction, and to throw himfelf on his people : but it proved in vain. His. favorite ministers perfuaded him that they fuffered for his fake; that the aim of their enemies was to dethrone him by difgracing them; and whilft all the troubles of his reign were due to his fupport of them, they made him believe that they fuffered for executing his orders, and maintaining his authority .--- Nay, they reprefented to him that, by accusing the counfellors, a man plainly fhews that he believes the fovereign incapable of governing; and that the readieft way to difcredit a prince, is perfuading his fubjects, that he makes use of ill ministers .--- These arguments and artifices, ridiculous as they feem, fucceeded, and had their effect for fome time longer.

THE deluded king entered into a clofer conjunction than ever with his minifters. He took their iniquities on himfelf; made their caufe his own; was privy to their plots of poifoning their enemies; of packing juries; of corrupting the judges to give opinions againft law; and to all that dirty work which they wanted, not he. Nay, by his encouragement they raifed troops; and a battle was fought in their quarrel; but they were defeated, and the fourteenth parliament, called the wonder-working parliament, having punifhed the judges and minifters with proper feverity, endeavored to reconcile the king and his people. They gave him great fubfidies, and renewed their homage and fealty to him. EVEN.

EVEN all this still proved in vain. No experience was fufficient to reclaim RICHARD the fecond. He governed tyrannically at home, and took a wife, and bought a peace from France. It is remarkable that the peace coft him four hundred thousand pounds, much more than he got by his wife. His favorite ministers had before this time, endeavoured to perfuade him to give up Calais, and purchase the friendship of France, to affift him against the lords and others, who opposed This is not the laft, nor least instance of conducting him. foreign affairs purely with regard to the interest of ministers, and without any to the honor and interest of the nation.

THE factions among the great men were of double advantage to the king for a time.

FIRST, the body of the people, who fhewed themfelves fufficiently animated with a fpirit of liberty, grew cool in efpoufing the quarrels of the lords, after they thought liberty fecured by the proceedings of parliament, in the tenth year of this king; and tho' many particular actions of violence, of treachery, and of cruelty, were committed by RICHARD the fecond, they bore all with the greatest patience for feveral years.

In the next place, thefe factions among the great men enabled the king to divide them, to play one against the other; and to build up his tyranny on the ruins of both. His uncle, the duke of GLOUCESTER, was basely betrayed, and barbaroufly murdered by him. He procured a packed parliament, confifting of men imposed on the fhires and towns by the king's authority, wholly managed by court favorites, and which bent all it's endeavors to deftroy the liberties and privileges of the people. With the help of fuch a parliament, he wreaked vengeance on those who had opposed Uu 2 him;

THE people still bore, and it is probable that the king, and others as well as he, imagined that they would be obliged to bear on, fince the whole legiflature united in their oppreffion. But in this he was deceived. When the parliament took the part of the people, the people followed the motions of parliament. When they had no hopes from parliament, they followed the first standard which was fet up against the king. The fame spirit of liberty, which had been so flow to act under fo many provocations, acted with the greatest vigor, when it was least expected. The king, at the head of an army in Ireland, the duke of YORK at the head of another in England, and the earl of SALISBURY at the head of a third, could do the king no fervice. The armies would not fight for the king against their country. The whole nation abandoned him, or acted against him. Some of his ministers were hanged; particularly those who had been the great instruments of taxing and opprefling the people. He was, at length, forced to refign, and to fubscribe an inftrument with his own hand, by which he confessed himself unworthy to govern the kingdom any longer. This inftrument of refignation was not only unanimoufly approved of in parliament, but articles of acculation were ordered to be drawn up against him, to justify their refolution of depofing him. These articles were thirtyfive in number, fetting forth the particulars of his milgovernment; two of which are to this effect:

"THAT he had put the administration of the public affairs in the hands of unexperienced and ill-defigning perfons, to the great damage of the people, who were loaded with exceflive taxes.

" THAT

It is very observable, that these extremitics fell upon RI-CHARD the fecond, at a time when every thing feemed to contribute to his fupport, in the exercise of that arbitrary power which he had affumed. Those whom he had most reason to fear, were removed either by violent death, or banishment; and others were fecured in his interest by places, or favors at court. The great offices of the crown, and the magiftracy of the whole kingdom, were put into fuch hands as were fit for his defigns; befides which, he had a parliament entirely at his devotion : but all these advantageous circumstances ferved only to prove that a prince can have no real fecurity against the just refentments of an injured and exasperated nation; for, as RAPIN' observes upon the fad catastrophe of this reign, and that of EDWARD the fecond ; " in fuch go-" vernments as that of England, all endeavors used by the "king to make himfelf abfolute, are but fo many fteps to-" wards his own downfal."

It is farther obferved by another eminent writer upon this reign, which he juftly calls a reign of favorites, " that the " king in his diftrefs, faw himfelf forfaken by thofe whom " he fhould have forfaken before; the very men, who had " fo much flattered him with their exceffive love and loyalty; " and like thofe mean infects, which live with a little warmth, " but fhrink at any change of weather, they who had con-" tributed to all his errors in his profperity, transplanted " their zeal into the new funfhine, as foon as his fucceffor " demanded the crown."

LETTER VII.

F ROM the reigns of EDWARD the third, and RICHARD the fecond, we fhall haften downwards, as faft as fome neceffary obfervations will permit. Those of the princes of York and Lancaster, form a period of more than eighty years, which passed in foreign and civil wars, in frequent revolutions of government, and in all those disorders which usually accompany and follow such revolutions.

THE party of RICHARD the fecond, even after the death of that unhappy prince, broke out into open rebellion against HENRY the fourth : but their efforts were vain. He held the crown fast, which the parliament had given him; and the chief of his oppofers perifhed in their attempts. Happy had it been, if they alone had fuffered ; but here we must observe a neceffary and cruel confequence of faction. As it oppreffeth the whole community, if it fucceeds; fo it often draws oppreffion, not on itfelf alone, but on the whole community, when it fails. The attempts to dethrone HENRY the fourth, justified him, no doubt, in supporting himself by a military force. They excufed him likewife, very probably, in the minds of many, for governing with a fevere hand; for doing feveral illegal and tyrannical actions; for invading the privileges of parliament, at least in the point of elections; and for obtaining, by these means, frequent and heavy taxes on the people : for as all this might appear the harder, becaufe it happened in the reign of a king who had no title to his crown but the goodwill of the people, and the free gift of parliament; fo it might appear, on the other hand, the lefs grievous, becaufe fome part of it was rendered necessary by the opposition which a faction made 5 made to a parliamentary eftablishment; and because the reft of it was represented, perhaps, under that umbrage, to be fo likewise, by the court logic of that age.

A PEOPLE may be perfuaded to bear patiently a great deal of oppreflion, as long as they can be perfuaded that they bear it only to defend their own choice, and to maintain their own acts; but if they difcover this to be nothing more than a pretence, by which fuch powers are kept up as are unneceffary to their fecurity, and dangerous to their liberty; by which the wealth of the whole nation is drained into the coffers of a few; and by which, in one word, they become exposed to ruin by the very means which they took to avoid it; it cannot be expected that they will be patient very long.

IT deserves particular notice, that altho' HENRY the fourth was willing to fhew his clemency, at the beginning of his reign, by inflicting a very flight punifhment on the wicked and hated minifters of the late king; yet it being alledged in their excuse, that RICHARD had compelled them to act, the parliament took occasion from thence to pass an act, by which it was declared that, for the future, compulsion should be no legal excuse to justify actions contrary to law. The reasonableness and expediency of this act are very manifest; for it is the indifpenfible duty of a good minister, to diffuade his majefty from all illegal measures; or, if he cannot prevail, to quit his fervice, rather than fuffer himfelf to be made the inftrument of them : and if the commands of the prince were to be allowed a fufficient justification, the prerogative of doing no wrong would be extended to ministers, and nobody would be left accountable for mal-administration.

In the fhort, but triumphant reign of HENRY the fifth, the fpirit of faction was awed; and the fpirit of liberty had no occafion of exerting itfelf, at leaft with flruggle and in any fignal manner, under a prince juft, moderate and pious, according to the religion of those times.

THE reign of his fon was the reign of faction; and it difclofes an horrid fcene of iniquity, folly, madnefs. The fcandalous management of public affairs, which brought infinite lofs and difhonor to the nation, gave real occafion, as well as pretence, to commotions and infurrections. The contemptible character of the man who fat on the throne, revived the hopes of the faction of York. The faction of Lancafter took the alarm. Moft of the great and active men were attached to one fide or to the other, by obligation, by refentment, by hopes, or by fears. The national intereft was funk, to the fhame of the nation, in the particular intereft of two families.

In the civil wars, which happened a century and an half, or two centuries before this time, the point in difpute was how the people fhould be governed. In thefe we are fpeaking of, the point in difpute was who fhould govern. The firft was worth contending for, and deferved all the blood which was fhed in the quarrel. But this cannot be faid of the laft, which ought always to be looked upon with great indifference; except in cafes, where it has fo immediate and neceffary a relation to the firft, that fecuring the firft depends, in a great meafure, on fettling the laft. Such cafes have happened; and particular inftances may be eafily found; but the contrary cafes, where men have fought for governors, without regard to government, are eafy to be found likewife; and that was plainly the cafe of the two factions of York and Lancafter.

THE parliaments in those days feemed to be in another temper; very little concerned who was king, and very muchto preferve the conflitution. In the many revolutions which happened, each fide would have the parliament for them.. Whatever titles they fet up, they were glad to hold the crown by the grant, or by the confirmation of parliament. The parliament wifely complied, whoever prevailed. The chance of war determined who fhould be king; at one time HENRY the fixth, at another EDWARD the fourth, and the parliament accordingly placed them on the throne, and fettled their government.

THERE is another observation which ought to be made,, before we leave this period of time. The reigns of RICHARD. the fecond, and HENRY the fourth had shewn the dangerous confequences of that influence which the crown had obtained in the elections of members of parliament. The watchful fpirit of liberty was foon alarmed, and prevailed to make fuch regulations about elections, and about the qualifications of the electors and the elected, as feemed at that: time fufficient to prevent this influence for the future. Thefe regulations appear in feveral laws, made during the reigns of the three Lancastrian princes; and our elections proceed, in a great measure, upon them to this very day. Thefe regulations have required, and must, in the nature of things, require to be altered, as the course of accidents, or the change of national circumstances shall suggest reasons. for fo doing. But then fuch alterations have been, and ought always to be contrived fo as to adapt them better, and to enforce them more ftrongly; because the principle on which they are founded, can never vary, and is fo effential: to the prefervation of liberty, that if it be loft, and if a practice in opposition to it should ever prevail, the ballance of our government would be that moment loft, and the. British X x. Vo'L. I.

For this reafon, Mr. RAPIN observes very justly, " that " there are but two ways of depriving the English of their " liberties; either by laying aside parliaments, or bribing " them." And in another place he fays, " that the English " freedom will be at an end, whenever the court invades " the free election of parliaments."

It is neceffary to infift upon this obfervation a little; becaufe it hath been ridiculed, tho' dully, and great pains have been taken to explode the doctrine contained in it, which was laid down in thefe words. "In a conftitution like ours, the "fafety of the whole depends on the ballance of the parts; "and the ballance of the parts on their mutual independency "on each other." Thefe words, it feems, even with thofe of THUANUS to explain them, convey no idea to the London Journalift; but this will be found, as I apprehend, to be his fault, or his defect, not OLDCASTLE'S. A man born without the fenfe of hearing, or ftopping his ears, and determined at any rate not to hear, may be deaf to the voice of STENTOR himfelf.

I SHALL not enter into any altercations with the London Journalift, nor go out of the road to have the honor of fuch company. But when I meet him in my way, I fhall encounter him frankly, without the least fear of being crushed by the weight of his arguments; or, which is more, by the power of his patron.

To fay, like this author, that the "carrying on of bufinefs, "and maintaining government by powers abfolutely diftinct, "and

" and abfolutely independent, is a meer Utopian fcheme, muft " proceed from ignorance or folly." Have not powers, abfolutely diffinct and independent, been joined by federal unions? Are no fuch examples to be found, even at this day? Has not this been brought about by the very reafon given to prove that it can never happen; becaufe men agree when they fee reafon for agreement; and they fee reafon for agreement, when they fee their intereft in agreeing? OSBORNE could not be in earneft, when he let fuch ftuff fall from his pen. He meant to elude the argument, and to perplex his readers, or he meant nothing. But this fhall not pafs. The matter is too important. He fhall be talked too as he defires, without a metaphor; and what has been advanced fhall be applied toour government.

A KING of Great Britain is that fupreme magistrate who has a negative voice in the legislature. He is entrusted with the executive power, and feveral other powers and privileges, which we call prerogatives, are annexed to this truft. The two houfes of parliament have their rights and privileges; fome of which are common to both, others particular to each. They prepare, they pass bills, or they refuse to pass fuch as are fent to them. They address, reprefent, advise, remonstrate: The fupreme judicature refides in the lords. The commons are the grand inquest of the nation, and to them it belongs: likewife to judge of national expences, and to give fupplies accordingly.

IF the legiflative as well as the executive power, was wholly in the king, as in fome countries, he would be abfolute; if in the lords, our government would be an ariftocracy; if in the commons, a democracy. It is this division of power, thefe diffinct privileges attributed to the king, to X.x. 2. the

the lords, and to the commons, which conftitute a limited monarchy.

AGAIN: as they conftitute a limited monarchy, fo the wifdom of our government has provided, as far as human wifdom can provide for the prefervation of it, by this divifion of power, and by thefe diffinct privileges. If any one part of the three which compofe our government, fhould at any time ufurp more power than the law gives, or make an ill ufe of a legal power, the other two parts may, by uniting their ftrength, reduce this power into it's proper bounds, or correct the abufe of it; nay, if at any time two of thefe parts fhould concur in ufurping, or abufing power, the weight of the third may, at leaft, retard the mifchief, and give time and chance for preventing it.

THIS is that ballance which has been fo much talked of, and this is the ufe of it. Both are plain to common fenfe, and to experience; as will appear farther in the courfe of thefe remarks, where we shall have occasion to shew, how often the proper use of this ballance has faved our constitution; and to what missfortunes we have been exposed by the neglect, or improper use of it.

SINCE this division of power, and these diffinct privileges conflitute and maintain our government, it follows that the confusion of them tends to deftroy it. This proposition is therefore true; that, in a conflitution like ours, the fastery of the whole depends on the ballance of the parts. Let us see whether it be true, that the ballance of the parts confists in their mutual independency.

To fpeak again without any metaphor, the power, which the feveral parts of our government have of controling and checking one another, may be called a dependency on one another, and may be argued for by those who want to throw darknefs round them, as the dependency oppofed to the inde-pendency, mentioned in the proposition. But the fallacy is grofs. We have shewn that this power of controul in each, which refults from the division of power amongst all the parts of our government, is necessary to the prefervation of it : and thus a fort of constitutional dependency, if I may have leave to express myself in that manner, is created among them; but this mutual dependency cannot be opposed to the independency pleaded for. On the contrary, this mutual dependency cannot fubfift without fuch an independency; for whenever this independency is loft, the mutual dependency is that moment changed into a particular, constant dependency of one part on two; or, which is still more unreasonable, of two parts on one. The conflitutional dependency, as I have called it for diffinction's fake, confifts in this; that the proceedings of each part of the government, when they come forth into action and affect the whole, are liable to be examined and controuled by the other parts. The independency pleaded for confifts in this; that the refolutions of each part, which direct these proceedings, be taken independently and without any influence, direct or indirect, on the others. Without the first, each part would be at liberty to attempt deftroying the ballance, by ufurping or abufing power; but without the last, there can be no ballance at all. I will illustrate this, by fupposing a prince, who claims and exercises a right of levying money without confent of parliament. He could not be opposed effectually, if the two houses of parliament had not a right to oppose him, to call his minifters to account; and to make him feel that, far far from being abfolute, he was under this conftitutional dependency; but he would not be opposed at all, if the two houses of parliament were under his influence, and incapable of directing their proceedings independently of him. One would be ashamed to infift thus much on a point fo very clear, if fome men were not fo hardened to all fenfe of fhame, as to maintain the contrary; and that there are men capable of doing this, is one of those melancholy fymptoms which characterize the prefent age. I could almost appeal to the cool thoughts, and the private reflections of fome of thefe writers, whether any thing can be more fcandalous than the task they have undertaken. To skreen their patrons, they endeavour to diftinguish us out of our greatest national advantages; as was observed in the case of Dunkirk. To reconcile the minds of men to fuch measures as their patrons may want, and as no honeft man will take, they endeavor to demolish the very corner stones on which the whole fabrick of liberty refts. Their iniquity, it must be confeffed, is very fystematical. When they write for corruption, they write for the means. When they write for. the dependency of the parliament on the court, they write for the end. Well might OLDCASTLE fay of these writers, their patrons and abettors, " that the mask was pulled off " on one fide." Let me conjure them, in the name of modefty, to call themfelves whigs no longer. It is time they fhould lay that appellation. afide, fince it will not be hard. to prove, from the general tenor of their writings, that the maxims they advance, the doctrines they inculcate, and the: conduct they recommend, lead to the deftruction of civil: liberty, as much as the political leffons of SIBTHORPE, MAN-.WARING, or archbishop LAUD himself. They and their followers declared themfelves directly against liberty. To plead for it was almost blasphemy ;. and to affert it little less than the 7

the fin against the Holy Ghost, according to the doctrines taught by those divines. Such absurdities made few converts in those days; and the preachers of them would meet with the utmost contempt in these. But the writers, of whom we now complain, affect to maintain the caufe of liberty, whilft they betray it. They affert the principles of liberty in general, and fometimes reafon upon them well enough; but when they apply them to particular cafes, they prevaricate, evade, and exert all their poor endeavors to turn the cannon of liberty against herself. The others had faenum in cornu. - They put mankind on their guard against them, and were the true promoters of all the mischief and confusion which followed, when the nation run into the utmost extremes, in opposition to them. These men infinuate themfelves as friends to liberty. They are looked upon as fuch by fome few perfons, who mean well to liberty, even at this time; and yet they are almost wholly employed in promoting that which is deftructive of liberty, and inconfiftent with it, corruption and dependency. LAUD and the others endeavored openly to lop the brances and cut down the tree; but thefe men are privately poifoning the root of liberty. The power of the court, and the authority of the lawyers could not make the levying fhip-money pafs for law, nor prevail on the nation to bear it. But if it were poffible to suppose an house of commons as dependent as these lawyers, (and they would be as dependent, if the doctrines which we oppose prevailed amongst them) the nation might then be loaded with taxes, opprefied with debts, and reduced to the greatest misery by law. Our liberties, as well as our eftates, might be taken from us. We might be legally undone. These are possible confequences of such doctrines. If they are not probable, we owe no thanks to the weekly preachers of them. The nature of our prefent fettlement.

fettlement, which is built on the foundation of liberty, the intereft and honor of the prince now on the throne, as well as of all his illuftrious posterity, are our fecurity against these dangers; but still I fay, we owe no thanks to the writers on the fide of the ministry.

I HAVE dwelt pretty much upon this point, to fhew what is the real defign of thefe remarks; and I will venture to add that those perfons who oppose fuch doctrines as we have been opposing, will appear at last to be the truest friends to his majesty king GEORGE, and the protestant succession; which can subsist only upon those principles upon which it was originally established.

LETTER VIII.

T F the reign of HENRY the fixth was a reign of faction, those of the house of York were so likewise.---The popularity, bravery, cruelty, rashness, uxorious fields, incontinence of EDWARD the fourth; in short, his good and his bad qualities worked the different effects of so fupporting, exasperating and increasing factions. The characters of HENRY the fixth's queen and of the earl of WARWICK, to mention no more of the principal actors on that bloody stage, conspired to maintain and aggravate this national calamity.

In these long continued struggles, the whole nation became involved, and the factions of York and Lancaster growing every day more animated and better difciplined, we are not to wonder that they fought usque ad internecionem; at leaft, till the field of battle, the fcaffold, and fome theatres of clandestine murthers had left no man on one fide alive, who was in a condition to oppose or give jealousy to the other. But that which may very juftly raife our wonder, is that EDWARD the fourth, having fecured to himfelf and his family the poffeffion of the throne, by the murther of HENRY the fixth, and his fon, and by the total defeat of the whole Lancastrian party, should suffer two new factions to be nursed up, which divided his own party, occafioned the murther of his fons, and by establishing the short-lived tyranny of his brother, brought the earl of RICHMOND to the throne, and funk for ever the house of York in that of Lancaster.

EDWARD the fourth's queen was the original caufe of all this mifchief, and a principal fufferer herfelf in the courfe of it. Vol. I. Yy She She was refolved to govern at any rate ; and RAPIN obferves, "that as her being queen gave her no manner of title to "meddle with the affairs of the public, fhe knew how to "manage that matter another way ; namely, by the influ-"ence fhe had over the king. Tho' EDWARD often proved "falfe to her, fhe bore it very patiently, and never fhewed "her uneafinefs at it. EDWARD, charmed to find himfelf "at liberty to purfue his inclinations, without danger of "continual reproaches, repaid her moderation with the moft "obliging and condefcending behavior; of which fhe knew "how to make a good ufe." She maintained this afcendant over her hufband to the laft, and for a little complaifance, which coft her nothing in prefent, fhe purchafed a degree of power in the flate, which coft her dear in confequence, by alienating the affections of the people from her hufband during his life, and ruining his family afterwards, as I have hinted before.

" HER aim was, according to RAPIN, to fecure her power during the king's life, and in cafe fhe furvived him, to make fure of the government of the kingdom, in the name of the prince her fon, when he fhould come to be on the throne; but by a fatality, not unufual to the beft-laid projects, this very thing proved the occasion of her own, and her family's ruin."

I CANNOT think, as RAPIN feems to do, that her project deferved to be ranked amongft thofe which are the beft laid! It appears to be the narrow project of a woman, who had cunning, infinuation, and the fpirit of intrigue, with much pride and ambition; but wanted that extensive knowledge; and that fuperior genius, fuch as CATHERINE of Medicis, and our queen ELIZABETH poffeffed, which is neceffary to conduct fo great a defign as her paffion prompted her to undertake;

for what was her project? Was it to acquire an interest in the nation, by deferving well of it ?---Nothing lefs. It was fingly this; to form a faction at court, by raifing her relations and immediate dependents, which fhould be wholly her own, and into whole hands the might throw all the power and profit which the king had to beftow. She had the good luck to compass this defign, and triumphed, no doubt very wifely, in her great fuccefs. Surrounded by her creatures, fhe looked no farther than that circle, and either took no notice of the temper of the nation, or judged of it by the temper of the court. But the rife of this faction immediately formed another, and established the distinction of antient and new nobility. The former had the true natural ftrength, which great eftates in land and eftablished credit in the nation gave them. The latter had no ftrength of their own, none but that adventitious ftrength, which arofe from employments and favor at court. They brought nothing to court, which could make the court amends for the envy and discontent which their elevation created. To fupply this, two things were done; which ferved, perhaps, to fortify the queen in her delusion, and thereby made the ruin of her ambitious projects the furer. All those who were not in the good graces of her faction, were difgraced at court, and in effect banished from it. Nay they were perfecuted by the power of it; as the duke of CLA-RENCE, the king's own brother, was even to death. The names of the parties of York and Lancaster might subfift and be made use of on proper occasions; but in reality, the being for or against the party of the queen, was the fole diftinction which prevailed; and even the friends of the houfe of York, whom the queen did not affect, were debarred from having the king's ear, excepting only three of his old and most faithful servants, who maintained themselves against her and her faction. I mean STAFFORD duke of Buckingham, HASTINGS and STANLEY.

ANOTHER

ANOTHER method which this queen took to ftrengthen herfelf and her faction, was by raking up money by illegal and oppreflive means; particularly by fetting profecutions on foot against the rich men of the kingdom, feveral of whom were arraigned of high treasfon, and encouraging the judges to get them found guilty at any rate. HABINGTON observes in his history of this king, "that as their wealth was the principal "evidence against them, tho' their perfons were acquitted, "their estates were found guilty."

THE fame hiftorian obferves farther, " that the memory of " thefe carriages hithertofore, in a bufinefs that concerned " the life of a man reputed innocent, drew the world into " much fear that he would now decline to rigor. Neither " was the king totally excufed, altho' this cruel avarice was " laid to the queen, who having a numerous iffue and kin-" dred, by favor raifed up to the higheft titles, was almoft " neceffitated, for fupportance of their honors, to rack the " kingdom."

EDWARD feemed fenfible before his death, of the mifchievous confequences which this conduct, and the clafhing of two factions might produce. He endeavored to prevent them, by "reconciling the two parties; a poor expedient! "as RAPIN juftly obferves, which could not eafily produce "the effect he expected."

THE duke of GLOUCESTER, who concealed his defign till his brother's death, took advantage of these factions. He made his court publicly to the queen, and held a private correspondence with the opposite party. Nay he found means, by fomenting it, to raise a third for himself.

I HAVE dwelt the longer in this place, on the ftrange turns and cruel effects of faction; because I believe, no example can be produced out of any history, which fets them in a ftronger light; and because this period of time affording but fmall matter to recommend the fpirit of liberty, which had little to do in the transactions of it, I imagine that pointing out the fatal confequences of the contrary fpirit, which then prevailed, may answer the fame end, as exposing of vice is frequently the strongest recommendation of virtue.

But we must not imagine, notwithstanding all the contrary appearances in this period, that the fpirit of liberty was abfolutely extinguished. Tho' that flame was lost, for the most part, in the constant glare of faction, yet it was still alive; and by living, preferved the constitution of our government during the whole course of these civil wars.

IF we look closely into these scenes of confusion, we may discover many particular instances of the operations of this fpirit. Such were the difficulties and delays opposed to the grant of tonnage and poundage, for nine years together; and the many reftrictions added to this grant, when it was at laft obtained by EDWARD the fourth. Other inftances to the fame purpose might be quoted; but we chuse to infist on a more general observation, already mentioned by us, which runs through the whole period, and is fo ftrongly vouched by hiftory as to admit of no cavil.

THE observation we are going to make, contains a memorable exception to this proposition, which is but too generally true, that the spirit of liberty and the spirit of faction are incompatible, and cannot long fubfift together. The virtue of our anceftors made this exception; and if it hath been remembered bered to their fhame, that they funk the national intereft in the particular interest of two families ; it ought to be remembered to their honor, that they did fo in this fingle point only, who fhould reign, and in no other. We took notice, in a former paper, that upon every revolution, each fide engaged the parliament for them, and that whoever prevailed, the parliament wifely complied. This conduct, which lasted from RICHARD the fecond down to RICHARD the third, preferved our liberties; but it could not have been purfued, nor could our liberties by confequence have been preferved, if the fpirit of liberty had not been latent in the hearts of those very men who feem to breathe nothing but faction. How could it have happened that the fole title of conquest was ever established in fo many revolutions brought about by the fword, if the actors in them had not been strongly affected with a love and reverence for the free conftitution of our government? The princes of York and Lancaster themselves were willing, nay defirous to have a parliamentary confirmation of their titles, real or pretended. But how came they to be fo defirous of it? How came they to think it neceffary? The cafe is plain. The temper of their parties and of their armies begot this neceffity." The fpirit of liberty prevailed enough in the whole body of the nation, out of which these parties and armies were composed, to preferve the principles of public freedom, tho' not enough to preferve the public peace .--- Each fide contended to have a king of their own party; but neither fide would have a tyrant.--- They facrificed their lives to faction; but would not give up their liberties .--- The victorious armies led their kings to the foot of the throne ; but carried them no farther.

THE author of the Short hiftory of ftanding armies obferves that, " in all the wars of York and Lancafter, whatever party " prevailed, we do not find they ever attempted to keep up a " ftand-

" ftanding army. Such was the virtue of those times, fays " he, that they would rather run the hazard of forfeiting their " heads and eftates to the rage of the oppofite party, than cer-" tainly enflave their country, tho' they themfelves were to " be the tyrants."--- This remark is juft, as far as it goes; and it goes as far as that author wanted to carry it; but it is not fo full, nor carried fo far as hiftory will warrant. That the princes, who obtained the crown by their armies, did not attempt to govern by their armies afterwards, is most true, and may reflect fome honor on those princes, and on the heads of their parties. But there is fomething more than this remarkable in the conduct of those times; for even in the heat of victory, in the raptures of a fuccefsful revolution, and before the armies could be difbanded, we fee these princes obliged to afcend the fteps of the throne in fuch a manner, and under fuch conditions, as the parliament thought fit to prefcribe, and as were not always agreeable to them. This, I am fure, reflects great honor on the parliaments, who were actors in the last scenes of all these revolutions; and on the armies, who contented themfelves to become spectators in fuch conjunctures .--- We will take the first example which prefents itfelf in these wars.

THE duke of LANCASTER was at the head of an army of fixty thousand men, when he came to the crown. The proclamation which he published the very day he was crowned, shewed how very unwilling he was to seem to hold his crown purely by right of election. He would gladly have fet up that of conquest; or a title derived from RICHARD the second's refignation; or a title by blood; or any title but the true one. Notwithstanding this, he was obliged, when nothing could have obliged him but the second as ever was made. The two houses took notice of the blind claim of right which which he entered. They chofe him to be king, upon the queftion put to them, after having given their negative to the duke of YORK, to his fons, and to others, who were feverally propofed in the fame manner to them. They feem induftrioufly to have contrived and purfued, on this occasion, a method of proceeding as opposite as possible to the views and inclination of this prince, whose army attended him, and whose rival was his prisoner.

AGAIN; to take another example from the latter end of these wars. The battle of Northampton being won, and HENRY the fixth taken, the duke of YORK haftens out of Ireland to put himfelf at the head of his party and his army. The parliament meets. The duke afferts his undoubted right by defcent to the crown, which he demands as due to him, without any interpolition of parliament. He shews the utmost, and even an indecent impatience to take poffession of it. He is supported by his own party. He is opposed by others. But the matter is by all submitted to the debate and decifion of parliament. The debate itself must have been grievous enough to a prince fo fond of a crown, and fo much warmed with the notion of his hereditary right. But the decifion of this affair must have wounded him to the quick. So little regard was paid to his right, that he was forced to content himself with leaving the crown on the head of HENRY the fixth during that prince's life, and not to have the prospect of fucceeding to it, till after that prince's decease; which, by the way, was a point of the less value to him, because he was older than HENRY the fixth, and could not hope to be the better for it, according to the course of nature. He fubmitted to all these mortifications; and a very judicious historian attributes his fubmiffion to his moderation; but I believe those who fully confider his former conduct, and his passionate behavior behavior at this time, will hardly fubfcribe to fuch a judgment. His fubmiffion, like that of HENRY the fourth, in the cafe before-cited, was a fubmiflion, which the temper of his party rendered neceffary. They would not force the refolutions of the two houses; and why the two houses would go no farther in his favor, at that juncture, might eafily be accounted for, if this were a proper place for that difquifition .--- After the battle of Wakefield, where the duke of YORK was killed, and that of St. Alban's, where the earl of WARWICK was beaten, the faction of York were determined, by the dangers they had run, and by the loffes they had fuftained, to balance no longer, but to fet the crown on the head of the earl of MARCH; and yet they proceeded no otherwife than under the authority of parliament, which had ratified the agreement made between the late duke of YORK and HENRY the fixth. By one article of this agree-ment it was flipulated, that if king HENRY broke it in any point, the crown and royal dignity fhould immediately devolve on the duke of YORK, if alive; or, in failure of him, on his next heir. The earl of WARWICK therefore, in a kind of military affembly, (for a part of the army, at leaft, was there) proceeded to the election of EDWARD the fourth; but he proceeded on this foundation. The great efforts made to break this agreement and to defeat the effect of it, by king HENRY's queen, and the Lancastrian party, were interpreted, and not without color, as fo many infractions of it. By confequence, EDWARD the fourth had an immediate right to the crown, by virtue of the act of parliament made in confirmation of this convention, which act and convention were produced by WARWICK, who caufed them to be publickly read. The proceeding of this affembly, which hath a tumultuous air in hiftory, was therefore in reality a proclamation of a king, made by authority of par-VOL. I. Z 7. * liament.

LET us conclude, that if the spirit of faction hath, on fome occafions, prevailed over the fpirit of liberty, fo far as to defeat and even pervert the defigns of the latter; the spirit of liberty hath likewise revived, in it's turn, on other occafions, and prevented the confummation of that mifery which faction would naturally and of courfe have produced. Let us conclude that all ftanding armies, for whatfoever purpofe inftituted, or in whatfoever habit cloathed, may be eafily made the inftruments of faction; because a body of men separated, in many respects, from the rest of the nation, constrained to different customs, and in some measure subjected to different laws, may be eafily perfuaded that they have a different interest. Let us conclude that these casuifts in red, are the most dangerous in this respect, that having fwords by their fides, they are able at once to cut those gordian knots which others must untie by degrees. But let us conclude, at the fame time, that if a fpirit of liberty be kept up in a free nation, it will be kept up in the army of that nation; and that when it is thus kept up, tho' the fpirit of faction may do great hurt, it cannot complete the public ruin. We see the truth of this observation exemplified near three centuries ago; and let us remember with gratitude, that the fame truth was again confirmed to us no longer ago than two and forty years.

LETTER IX.

NE of the hiftorians of Britanny, if I remember right, and I think it is ARGENTRE, fays the people of that dutchy grew fo much tired with the difputes between CHARLES of Blois and the MONFORTS, that the two parties agreed, just before a battle, to make an end of the quarrel at once, by taking off that prince, against whom the fortune of the day should declare itself .--- Our ancestors were very far from following this example; but they feized the opportunity which was prefented to them, after RICHARD the third had usurped the throne, and murdered his nephews, of abolifhing tyranny, and extinguishing faction.

THE princes of York and LANCASTER butchered one another in fuch a manner, that the right of the former centered in ELIZABETH, eldeft daughter of EDWARD the fourth, and the pretenfions of the latter were allowed, by the whole Lancaftrian party, to belong to the earl of RICHMOND .--- This was the state of the families.

THE faction of York detefted RICHARD for his usurpation and cruelties .--- The faction of Lancaster hated him for his name; and neither the great qualities which he really had, nor the good qualities which he affected, could reconcile mankind to his barbarity .--- This was the temper of the nation.

THE opportunity thus formed, was improved by the univerfal concurrence, which a fpirit of liberty and a regard to the public good, independent of party, inspired. The faction of

of York became willing to receive a king of the houfe of Lancafter; and the party of Lancafter a queen of the houfe of York. All parties laboured to unite the two rofes; and faction itfelf was bent, in this fortunate conjuncture, to extirpate faction.

THE deposition of RICHARD, and the advancement of the earl of RICHMOND to the throne, upon this express condition, that he should marry the princess ELIZABETH, were purfued with fuccess, even when RICHARD thought himself most fecure; when the parliament had been obliged to confirm his usufurpation; to declare the children of EDWARD bastards; and to attaint the earl of RICHMOND.

WHAT a fcene of national peace and profperity was opened by this revolution and new fettlement! But how foon was it fhifted? How foon were the wife and honeft views of the many defeated by the cunning and iniquity of the few ?----HENRY the feventh, a creature of the people, if ever any prince was fuch, had been raifed to the throne, in order to cut up the roots of faction; to reftore public tranquillity; and to eftablifh a legal government on the ruins of tyranny.---He did the very reverfe of all this. His reign and that of his fon have been two of the fevereft, under which our country hath groaned fince the conqueft; and yet, in thefe very reigns, the foundations of liberty were laid much broader and ftronger than ever.---How this came about, it muft be ufeful, and perhaps it may be entertaining, to confider.

HENRY the feventh, who would have been glad a little before to have affured himfelf of the crown on any terms, grew difficult as foon as he had obtained it. He durft not avow a title by conqueft; but he evaded the appearances of a parliamen-7 tary

tary title very induftrioufly, and made the ceremony of his coronation precede the meeting of his parliament. He evaded, in the fame manner, the appearances of any communication of right from the princefs ELIZABETH, by deferring his marriage till an act had paffed to fettle the crown on him and his pofterity, without any mention of the houfe of York. In fhort, his whole fkill, credit and power were employed to get the act of fettlement fo generally and fo ambiguoufly penned, as to leave him room to affert afterwards a right inherent in himfelf, and independent of the authority of parliament. Nay, he went farther; for, in the bull of confirmation, which he obtained from the pope, and in which he affected to have all forts of titles enumerated, he took particular care to have that of conqueft inferted.

SUCH a conduct gave fufficient reafon for alarm; but we do not find that it was taken. The tyrant was dead, and the new eftablifhment was made. The nation was overjoyed; and the work of liberty was done by halves. The new king found a compliance with all his meafures, as new kings generally do. But little reflection was made, perhaps, at that time, on these proceedings of the court; or if a just reflection was made, we may easily believe that it was foon fifled by that adulation, which represents the most necessary precautions, the most just complaints, and the affertion of the clearest rights, as proofs of difaffection.

THE whole courfe of HENRY the feventh's reign was anfwerable to thefe beginnings; and he feems to have eftablished himself in the power of pursuing principles of government, evidently repugnant to those upon which he had been raised. to the throne, before the nation was well aware of what he intended. He planted faction anew, and was the true cause of all the diffurbances which followed from it, and which began even in the first year of his reign. Many of the York party had fignalized themfelves in his cause. All of them fubmitted to his government; and that fmall branch of this party, which had supported RICHARD the third, was too inconsiderable to burt him; but he foon made it confiderable, by driving almost the whole York party into that interest. "He had conceived, fays RAPIN, fo mortal an hatred for the "whole house of York, that he let flip no opportunity to "humble the Yorkis; behaving always towards them not as a just king, but like the head of a party."

THAT fome of his ministers, of the Lancastrian party, might find their private account in such a measure, and facrifice to it both the interest of their master and their country, is obvious enough; but how the king, who was certainly an able man, could prefer dividing, instead of uniting his people in affection and obedience, would appear very marvellous, if experience had not taught us that men of the greatest genius fall fometimes into the fame errors, as men of the least genius would be apt to commit in the fame circumstances.---How this happens we are not, in this place, to enquire.

HENRY the feventh proceeded as he had been fuffered to fet out, and eftablished by degrees, and those not flow, a power almost absolute. His jealous, his pride, and his infatiable fordid avarice had their full fwing. He became hated even by his own party, and might very probably have loss his crown, if many circumstances, both at home and abroad, had not confpired in his favor, and if he had not improved them all with the utmost ability of council and dexterity of management. The chief of these circumstances, and it well deferves to be remarked, was this,---they who ventured their eftates and lives in feveral infurrections against him, and they who privately fomented thefe infurrections, inftead of uniting on a national principle, and bending their endeavors to a reformation of government, united on a principle of faction : for the king's behavior had revived this fpirit, as we observed above; but still this spirit, tho' revived, had not attained it's former ftrength. The nation in general was tired of faction; dreaded a relapfe into the confequences of it, and would not engage for a SIMNEL, a WARBECK, or even a real prince of the house of York. A national coolnefs on one fide, and vigilance and vigor on the king's part, defeated all these enterprizes as fast as they were formed. Every one of these defeats gave HENRY additional ftrength and increase of reputation, which is strength in it's effects. Thus it happened in this cafe; and thus it hath happened in many others. By making an ill use of his power, the king was the real author of all the diforders in the ftate, and of all the attempts against his government; and yet, the better to prevent fuch diforders, and to refist fuch attempts, farther powers were intrusted to him. Because he had governed ill, it was put in his power to govern worfe; and liberty was under-mined, for fear it fhould be overthrown. It hath fared fometimes with monarchy as with the church of Rome. Both have acquired greater wealth and power by the abufe of what they had, and mankind have been egregiously the bubbles of both.

WE must not however conclude that this king made force the fole, tho' he made it the principal expedient of his government. He was wife enough to confider that his court was not the nation; and that however he might command with a nod in one, he must captivate, at least in fome degree, the good-will of mankind, to make himfelf fecure of being long obeyed in the other; nay more, that he must make his people fome fome amends for the opprefiions which his avarice particularly exposed them to fuffer. For these reasons, as he strained his, prerogative on some occasions very high, so he let it down again upon others; and affected to shew to his parliaments much condescension, notwithstanding his pride, as well as much communication of counsels, notwithstanding his referve.

To attribute to this SOLOMON of Great Britain the fole merit of the laws made in his time, as fome have done, feems unreafonable; but it was certainly great merit in him, and we may add rare merit, inftead of oppofing, or refufing, conftantly to remunerate his people, by promoting and passing of "good laws, which evermore were his retri-"bution for treasure." These are my lord BACON's words, and better than his cannot be found to express the general character of the laws which the wifdom of those times produced. " They were deep and not vulgar; not made upon " the fpur of a particular occasion for the prefent; but out " of providence of the future, to make the effate of the " people still more and more happy, after the manner of the legislators in antient and heroical times."---Hufbandry, manufactures, general commerce, and increase of useful people were carefully attended to, and confiderably advanced; fo that whilft the weight of taxes and the vexations of EMPSON, DUDLEY, and their fubordinate harpies were feverely felt, every man felt likewife the particular benefit which he received in the general advantages procured to the nation. These drops of manna, which fell from the throne, foftened the murmurs of the people. They could not make the king beloved, but they made him lefs hated : and the middle and lower ranks of men, who felt lefs the rigor of his government, felt more immediately the effects of his care and his wifdom.

WE will not refine fo much as to fay that the commons were patient under the pressures of this reign, because they forefaw the confequences of those measures which the king took to leffen the power of his nobility. He did not, perhaps, himfelf difcern these consequences in their full extent; but furely if this part of his conduct was politic, it was no lefs popular at that time; fince the fame exorbitant power of the peers, which had been fo formidable to the crown, had not been lefs oppreffive to the commons. The weight of perfonal fervice had been terribly felt, during the wars of York and Lancafter; and the obligation of that tenure had, no doubt, contributed to prolong them. The tenant therefore, who found this fervice commuted into a rent, could not but think his condition mended, and be extremely pleafed with this alteration, tho' he did not fee the confequences of the other; which, by opening a way to the lords to alienate their lands, opened a way to the commons to increase their property, and confequently their power in the flate; as may be very eafily obferved in the fucceeding reigns.

LETTER X.

TENRY the eighth came to the crown with very great advantages. Whatever objections had been made to his father's title, there remained no pretence of objecting to his; and if any pretence had remained, the disposition to make use of it would not have been found. The nation was grown weary of faction; fond of tranquillity; and every day more and more attentive to the arts of peace.--- The prerogative had been extended wide and carried high ; and the means employed to acquire and maintain this authority, had been eftablifhed by a reign of twenty-four years.--- The treafures which HENRY the feventh had accumulated and left to his fon, were immenfe; and in leaving him thefe treafures, he left him that which was more valuable than all of them. He left him an opportunity of gaining the affections of his people, on his acceffion to the throne, by putting a ftop to that public rapine which had been fo long exercifed; and by difgracing and punishing those who had been the principal instruments of it. HENRY the eighth feized the opportunity and improved it. He confirmed, in the first moments of his reign, that pardon which his father had granted in the laft of his life, and when he could hope for no farther profit by not pardoning. He invited, by proclamation, fuch as had been wronged to complain, and promifed them fatisfaction.

IF HENRY the eighth had been avaritious, or weak enough to prefer wealth to popularity, he would have obferved another conduct. He would have thought those men fittes to ferve him, who had fignalized themselves most in fleecing the the people; and without any regard to their ability in playing the game of flatefmen, he would have chofen them purely for their skill in packing the cards. EMPSON and DUDLEY would have continued in power, and have rifen in favor. But he was too wife, or too honeftly counfelled in thefe beginnings of his government, to purfue fuch measures, or to employ fuch ministers. He kept some in his council, who were of approved abilities; but far from loading his own administration with the principal guilt of the former; far from grieving and provoking his people, by countenancing the most hated, and the most justly hated, men of the whole kingdom, he threw those criminals out of the fanctuary of the court, and exposed them to that national vengeance, under the weight of which they perifhed .--- The manner in which their lives were taken away, feems liable to great objection, and I would not be thought to approve it; for a fpirit of liberty can never approve fuch proceedings even against the worst and the most guilty of men, as may be applied to deftroy the best and the most innocent. All I mean to commend is the wifdom of HENRY the eighth, in abandoning these ministers; in gaining the affections of his fubjects ; and in making fuch impreffions of gratitude on their minds, as lasted long and were of fervice to him, even when he oppreffed the people in his turn.

VANITY and prefumption were reigning qualities in the character of this prince. The first betrayed him into continual errors. The last made him perfist in them. Pride is observed to defeat it's own end, by bringing the man who feeks efteem and reverence, into contempt. Vanity, felffufficiency, prefumption, the offspring of pride, have much the fame effect; fince no one is fo liable to be deceived and governed, as he who imagines that he is capable of neither.

THE characters of the princes and popes of this age, ren-dered the scene of foreign affairs very important. HENRY the eighth was happy enough to have no intereft of his own abroad worth engaging him in the broils of the continent. He was free from guaranties of foreign dominions, and from all engagements to foreign princes, which could in the least encumber him. In this state he might have kept himself with equal dignity and advantage. He might have increafed his strength, whilst other princes wasted theirs. He might have been applied to as the mediator, or arbitrator of the christian world; and have found his account in all the wars and negotiations, without being a party in them.---He did the very contrary. A rofe, bleffed by the pope; an emperor ferving in his army, and taking his pay; a whimfical project of conquefts never defigned to be made, and impossible to be kept, if they had been made, were fufficient to draw him into the most extravagant engagements, in which he always played gold against counters with allies, who generally played counters against gold. His engagements of this kind, became numberless, frequently inconfistent, and fo very rash and unadvised, that whilft his aim, or his pretence, was to keep a ballance between the great powers of Europe, he more than once affifted the ftrongeft to oppress the weakest .--- The spring of all this strange conduct lay in the private interests and passions of WOLSEY, who became his first minister very early, and was his favorite earlier. If HENRY the eighth negociated perpetually, and was perpetually the bubble of those with whom and for whom he negotiated, this happened chiefly because he was, in the first place, the bubble of his minister .---WOLSEY's avarice was fed and his ambition flattered by the emperor; by the court of France; and by that of Rome, in their turns. He supported himself, in great measure, at home, by the opinion of his credit abroad; and his mafter's favor to him him was ftrengthened by the art of those whom he ferved at his mafter's and his country's expence. In fhort, the fuccess, or disappointment of his private schemes, were the hinges on which the whole policy of this nation turned for twenty years: and the grosses mission turned for twenty years and the grosses mission the midst of universal disappursued, by the minister, in the midst of universal disapprobation, was fanctified by the king.

THE king, no doubt, thought himfelf as infallible in the choice of men as in the choice of meafures; and therefore when he had once given his confidence to WOLSEY, no matter by what inducements, his prefumption fkreened the minifter from his fufpicion.

It was eafy for WOLSEY to keep his mafter from hearkening to particular advice, or to the general voice of the people; becaufe it was eafy to perfuade him that he wanted no advice; that he could not be deceived, tho' his people might; and perhaps, that it was unbecoming a great prince to alter his meafures, or withdraw his favor, on the clamors of the public. At the fame time, we may fairly fuppofe (for the monuments of hiftory will juftify us in fuppofing) that the butcher's fon was not fuch a bungler, nor rendered by a low education fo void of addrefs, as not to know how to infinuate without the air of advifing; and how to receive all his own fuggeflions back from his mafter, in the ftyle of orders, with the utmoft demonftration of implicit fubmiffion to his judgment, and abfolute refignation to his will.

But however blind the king might be, the eyes of the people continued open to his and their true intereft. The difcontent grew general; and to this general difcontent were owing the principal difficulties which HENRY the eighth met with, with, during the firft half of his reign.---As much complaifance as he had been ufed to find in his parliaments, he durft not always demand money of them, for the fupport of his enterprizes. His minifter foon put him upon the expedient of raifing it by his own authority. But thefe attempts were refented warmly, and oppofed fo flurdily, even when the rough name of a tax was changed into the fofter found of a benevolence, that the king was obliged to retract; to compound; to excufe himfelf; to difavow his minifter; and to pardon all thofe who had been concerned in particular infurrections, from a fear of one which might become univerfal.

No prince could be more firmly feated on his throne. No prince could be lefs framed to brook opposition. No prince could be lefs fusceptible of fear. And yet to this point of diftrefs did HENRY the eighth bring himfelf, by trufting his first minister too much, and regarding the sense of his people too little .--- All orders of men concurred on these occasions; and the merchants fignalized themfelves. Neither the flattery, nor the menaces of Wolsey could prevail on them to be filent, when they felt that their own and the national interefts were facrificed or neglected, at every turn. Much lefs could they be cozened fo far as to expose their fortunes in trade, the only fortunes which merchants acquired in those days, in order to conceal the blunder of a minister, or to stop the clamor against him. We find a remarkable instance of this behavior of the merchants in the year 1528; when the commerce of the Low countries, on which our woollen trade depended principally at that time, was interrupted by a war with the emperor, which evidently took it's rife from no other motive than a pique of the minister.

THE ill fuccefs of these illegal methods, obliged the king to have recourfe to his parliament: but his parliament thought like his people; and the opposition given in the house of commons was fuch as became the representative body of the nation. That which happened in the year 1523, is worthy of particular observation. It was not grounded only on the exorbitancy of the fum demanded, but likewife on the nature of the fervice for which the demand was made. As high as prerogative was carried at this time, and as undifputed a point as the power of the crown to make war or peace might be; yet it is undeniable that the commons would not give money without knowing how it was to be employed; and that they proportioned their grants to the judgment they made of the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the employment defigned .--- WOLSEY, the most infolent minister our nation had feen at that time, was however fo far from objecting to this method of proceeding in the house of commons, that he opened to that house, in a long discourse, the reasons of the king's measures, as he affected to call his own measures; and endeavored to prove the neceffity of fupporting them. Nay, when neither his rhetoric could perfuade, nor his authority influence, he offered to debate the whole matter, and to anfwer the objections of those who opposed the king's defires. The house rejected his offer ; observed their forms ; maintained their dignity. They difapproved a war, wantonly undertaken, and in which the interefts of the nation were not concerned. They shewed however their regard to the king, by giving fome part of the fubfidy, and their regard to the kingdom, by refufing, to the laft, to give the whole.

As for the minister, he received the mortification which he deferved.---These frequent oppositions, on the part of the people and the parliament, were really made to the minister. 5 HENRY

HENRY the eighth feemed, on fome occafions, to defire that they should be so understood, even before WOLSEY's favor began to be in its wane; and yet we shall have no reason to be furprifed, if we confider the true character of this prince, that these very oppositions prepared his mind for receiving those leffons which WOLSEY was ready to give him, against liberty, and in favor of arbitrary power .--- A wicked minister, who neither gains, nor deferves to gain the good-will of a nation, must fecure and will endeavor to revenge himfelf, by perfuading his mafter to neglect it. Force and corruption being the fole means, by which he can maintain his power, and preferve his ill-gotten wealth, it is neceffary for him that the prince whom he ferves, fhould look upon those as the fole expedients by which government can be fupported. WOLSEY purfued this abominable fcheme. " He looked " upon the king's fubjects, fays RAPIN, as fo many flaves; " and unfortunately for them, he infpired the king by de-" grees with the fame principles; and infinuated to him, " that he ought to confider the parliament only as an in-" ftrument to execute his will."--- These were the feeds he fowed, which fell on a rank foil, and produced in the latter half of HENRY's reign, fuch bitter fruit as this nation never . tafted before, nor fince .--- WOLSEY had been the fcandal and the fcourge of his country, whilft he lived; and he continued to be fo even in the grave.

LETTER XI.

THE divorce of HENRY the eighth and CATHERINE of Arragon begins a new and most memorable æra in the general hiftory of England; and indeed of all Europe. It is the beginning likewife of a new period in the particular reign of which we are fpeaking .--- A king, who had been till now the great affertor of the authority of the pope, and the great defender of the doctrine of the church of Rome, undertakes to deftroy the former in his dominions, and gives feveral incurable wounds to the latter .--- A king, whofe whole attention had been employed abroad, and in whofe time " there was no " treaty and almost conventicle in Christendom, wherein he " had not his particular agent and intereft," as my lord HER-BERT expresses himself, becomes wholly taken up with domestic affairs; and if he looks abroad, during the reft of his life, it is chiefly on account of what paffes at home.---He, who had connived at feditions and pardoned infurrections, grows impatient of the least contradiction .--- He, who had often compounded with his parliaments, and fubmitted to them on many occafions, dictates all their proceedings; and the voice of the law is little elfe than the echo of the voice of the king .--- In fhort; he, who had been led, amused, governed by his minister, drives, over-bears, tyrannizes; butchers his fervants and his wives, his commons and his nobility.

WHEN HENRY the eighth first engaged in the affair of the divorce, he could not forefee the confequences of it; because he certainly did not expect the difficulties which gave occasion to them. He went on during the two first years, in the beaten Vol. I. B b b road, road, by which fo many others had gone before to the fame end; and he feemed to have no view befides that of employing the authority of one pope to undo what the authority of another pope had done. Nay, after CRANMER had began to open other views to him, he feemed still to cling to Rome, refolved to fucceed any way; but defirous to fucceed that way .--- Happy was it that he took his measures no better, and that he was no better ferved on this occasion than on many others !----He fuffered himfelf to be amufed by CLE-MENT the feventh, the leaft fcrupulous man alive; and who would have divorced him, or have done any other pontifical job for him, if the league formed to reduce the emperor's power in Italy had fucceeded. But the emperor's power there continuing to prevail, the pope concluded his treaty. with this prince on the most advantageous terms. He obtained that favorite point, for which he would have facrificed not only the interefts of HENRY the eighth, but even those of the papacy itself. I mean the re-establishment of the family of MEDICIS on the ruins of the Florentine liberty. The lofs of Genoa, the total deftruction of the French army in the kingdom of Naples, and feveral other confiderations, induced FRANCIS the first to make his peace with the emperor likewife, and to fubmit to the treaty of Cambray.

THUS did HENRY the eighth find himfelf at once difappointed in the expectations he had been made to entertain from the court of Rome, and defititute of all foreign affiftance; FRANCIS being the only ally, of whom he could avail himfelf to influence the councils of Rome, in opposition to the emperor.

IN this flate of affairs, HENRY reforted to that which will be always the beft and fureft referve of a king of Great Britain; the

the inclinations and affections of his people. He had not the trouble of difpofing them, for he found them already dif-pofed to his purpofes. The fpirit raifed by WICKLIFFE about two centuries before, against the usurpations of the pope and the clergy, was still alive. The sufferings of the Lollards, as his followers were called, had not abated it. The art of printing had been propagated; and the late fuccess of LUTHUR had encouraged it. There were multitudes therefore, in all parts of the kingdom, who defired a complete reformation of the church, both in doctrine and in difcipline. Others again were content that the papal authority, grievous in it's nature, and fcandalous in it's exercife, as well as the extravagant power and impertinent immunities of the clergy, fhould be taken away. But they meant to go no farther. Many would not go even fo far as this; but were still flaves to all their prejudices; and remained in the midft of this defection, attached to the pope, as well as to the corrupted doctrine, and the depraved discipline of the church.

WHILST the divorce was folicited at Rome, and the proceedings relating to it were carried on by the direction, and under the authority of the pope, it was the king's affair; it was the affair of his minifters. But when it appeared impracticable in this method, and HENRY refolved, in order to accomplifh it in another, to deliver himfelf and his people from the yoke of Rome; the affair of the divorce became a national affair, and the caufe of the king became the caufe of his fubjects. As he proceeded in it, he was encouraged to proceed. The concurrence of his people grew every day more general, and he was fupported with the greateft warmth. He foon held the clergy at his mercy, and the popifh party was broken and terrified, if not entirely crufhed.

DURING this eager purfuit after ecclefiaftical liberty, a power very dangerous to civil liberty was erected. We observed be-fore that the prerogative had been carried high, and extended wide in the reign of HENRY the feventh, who obtained much by law, and obtained more by his manner of conftruing and exe-cuting the law. His fon, parting with none of his authority, and improving the conjuncture fo as to acquire a great deal more, acquired fo much at last, that the power of the crown. exceeded by far that proportion, which is confiftent with the fecurity of public liberty and private property. It is true, indeed, that he always took care to have the law on: his fide; and would neither venture on the exercise of actsof power against it, or without it. His experience in the former part of his reign, had taught him the danger of fuch a conduct; and, in the latter part, he had no occasion to. purfue it. The opinion of the nation went along with him now; and, as exorbitant as his demands frequently were, his parliaments refused him nothing. At one time, they gave up to him, in a great degree, the legislative authority; and his proclamations were made, under fome reftrictions,, equivalent to acts of parliament. At another time, they. afcribed to him a fort of infallibility; and letters patent, under the great feal, were made neceffary to determine the articles of faith, which men were to believe fully, and the doctrines, rites and ceremonies, which they were to observe and practice under feveral penalties .--- The fufpicious flate of affairs abroad was amplified to give a pretence to one: of these laws; and the confused state of religion at home, and the clashing of parties about it, might afford fome color to the other .--- The truth is, that any pretence ferved, at this time, to grant whatever the king defired; a stronger instance of which cannot be imagined than that of the fubfidy, obtained in the year 1540. HENRY had got immenfe riches by the first and fecond suppression of monasteries... A prin--

A principal inducement to the laft, which was likewife the greateft, was this; that the king might be enabled, without taxing the people, to defend them against fuch invafions, as the court had been pleafed to fuppole; and with the rumors of which the nation had been purpofely alarmed. These invasions did not happen. HENRY continued in peace with all his neighbours : and yet, the very next year, he not only accepted from the clergy of the province of Canterbury, with the approbation of parliament, a grant of the fifth part of their revenue; but he demanded a fubfidy likewife of the houfe of commons. So extravagant a demand could not but meet with fome opposition. The fubfidy however was granted in as large a proportion, as if the nation had been engaged in a dangerous war. The reafonsfor granting it were almost burlesque. It was affirmed, by the king's party, that he had laid out vaft fums in fecuring the coafts; and that the keeping his fubjects in peace and plenty coft him more than the most burthensome war.----Thus a precedent was made of converting into ordinary aids of the government those heavy taxes, which ought never to be felt by the people, unlefs upon the most extraordinary occasions. That they ought to be laid in time of war neither was, nor ever could be doubted. That they were equally neceffary in time of peace, was now established by the logic of the court; and we may be fure that the argument would have been urged with still more force and effect, if. the nation had fallen, by the management of the courtiers in that age, into fuch a fituation as could neither be called properly a flate of war, or a flate of peace.

THE abfolute power which HENRY the eighth exercifed over the purfes, lives, liberties and confciences of his people, was due to the intire influence which he had gained over the parliament; and this dependency of the two houfes on the.

the king did, in effect, eftablish tyranny by law.---If we look for the true caufe of this dependency, we shall find it, as RAPIN hath very judicioufly observed, in those divisions of the nation, concerning religion, which I have mentioned above .--- The party, which oppofed all reformation, by a bigotted attachment to the discipline, as well as doctrine of the church of Rome, furnished the king with as many pretences for grasping at power, and squeezing money out of his people, as ambition could wifh, or profusion require .--The other two parties concurred with the king, and went together to a certain point; that is, to throw off the papal yoke, and to leffen the power of the clergy. But here they feparated, and went different ways; one to carry the reformation forward, and the other to ftop it where it then ftood ; whilft the king feemed to keep in a middle way between them both .---- Sometimes, he feemed to favor those whose principles led them to an intire reformation, and he touched the doctrine, tho' with a gentler hand than the discipline of the church.----Sometimes he appeared zealous for the doctrine, and even for fome part of the discipline; and the manner in which he often executed that bloody ftatute, the law of fix articles, would incline one to think that he joined to his political confiderations a tincture of religious prejudice on these heads. But however that was, certain it is that the hopes which each of these two parties entertained of the king, and the fears which they entertained of one another, occafioned their continual bidding for him, if I may be allowed to use fuch an expression. This emulation formed then, what it always must form, the most dangerous conjuncture to which liberty can be exposed. When the motives of contending parties are founded on private ambition and avarice, the danger is great. How much greater must it be, when those motives are founded on religion likewife; when the heads and hearts of both fides

are heated even to enthusiafm; when this fpirit mingles itfelf with the fpirit of faction; fo that fome through folly, and fome through knavery, are ready to facrifice public liberty to their particular fehemes of religion?

In fuch circumftances as thefe was this nation, when HENRY the eighth died; and if he had left a fon and fucceffor, of full age, and bold and enterprizing like himfelf, our liberties had been irretrievably loft, according to all appearances .----HENRY the eighth, by applying to his parliaments for the extraordinary powers which he exercifed, and by taking thefe powers for fuch terms, and under fuch reftrictions as the parliament imposed, owned indeed fufficiently that they did not belong of right to the crown. He owned likewife, in effect, more than any prince who went before him, how abfolutely the disposition of the crown of England belongs to the people of England, by procuring fo many different and oppofite fettlements of it to be made in parliament, and yet tyranny was actually established. The freedom of our government might florish in speculation; but certainly it did not subfift in practice .--- In the cafe therefore fuppofed above, our fore-fathers would very foon have found how fatal it is, in any circumstances, by any means, or under any pretences, to admit incroachments on the conflitution; and how vain it is, when these incroachments are once admitted, for the service of fome prefent turn, to prefcribe limitations to the exercife or duration of them.

BUT providence directed the courfe of things better, and broke those fhackles which we had forged for ourfelves. A minority followed this turbulent reign; the government was weak; the governors divided; and the temper of the people. fuch, as made it prudent to footh them. This the duke of SOMERSET

Somerset did out of inclination, and the duke of Northum-BERLAND out of policy. To the former we owe not only the complete establishment of the church of England on the ruins of popery, but the first and great steps which were made to reftore a free government. In the very first year of his administration, several acts which had passed in the reign of HENRY the eighth, and in some preceding reigns, grievous to the people, and deftructive of liberty, were repealed ; and among others that absurd act, which gave to proclamations the force of laws. The law of the fix articles was likewife repealed. Others were explained, and feveral new laws were made in favor of civil, as well as ecclefiaftical liberty; both of which got fo much ftrength, in the reign of EDWARD the fixth, that they were able to ftand the fliort but violent flock of queen MARY's reign. This princefs lived long enough to confirm, not to deftroy, our religion by perfecution. The ill-concerted infurrection of WYAT gave ftrength to the faction which prevailed at court, and difcouraged, for fome time, all opposition; nay, the methods taken to influence the elections, and to gain by corruption the members who were chosen, were carried on fo openly, that the price for which each man fold himfelf, was publickly known. No wonder then if the papal authority was reftored, and the queen's marriage with PHILIP the fecond approved. But this ftate of things could not last long, nor was the nation disposed to bear a continual facrifice of her interest to Rome and Spain.

THE parliament, corrupt as it was, began to revolt againft the court. The fpirit of liberty revived; and that fpirit, and the fpirit of reformation in religion, had made more progrefs than was readily perceived. This progrefs had been made principally among the commons; and therefore, tho' the authority thority of the crown, of the council, and of the great lords kept up other appearances, yet there was a fecret fire burn-ing, which must and would have broke out. The effects of the causes, laid in the reign of HENRY the feventh, began now to appear. The lands of the nobility were leffened, and those of the commons increased. Trade had been encouraged for feveral years. We fee that fome care had been taken of it, even in the troublefome times of EDWARD the fourth, and very much was done towards the advancement of it in the reigns of HENRY the feventh and HENRY the eighth. The West-Indies had been difcovered about half a century before; and part of the immense treasures, which flowed from thence into Europe, began to increase the profits; and, increasing the profits, to increase the industry of our merchants. HENRY the eighth had fold a very great part of the church lands at low prices, on purpose to engage the body of the nation in one common interest against the Romish clergy. The commons had made their use of this strain of policy, and had got into very great eftates in lands, by thefe as well as by other means : fo that the king, the lords and the church, who had formerly held fo great an overballance of property in land, had now little more than one third of the whole belonging to them; the confequences of which were not forefeen by queen MARY; neither did she live long enough to feel them in any great degree. They did not escape the penetration of her fifter. She forefaw them, and the great glory and happinefs of her reign may justly be attributed to this first principle; that she had the wifdom to difcern not only the actual alteration, which was already made, but the growing alteration, which would every day increase in the state of property; that fhe accommodated at once the whole fyftem of her government to this great change; and inftead of depending upon Ссс expe-VOL. expedients, which were now no longer of feafon, chofe the fole expedient that remained, for making herfelf and her people happy; which was to place the whole ftrength and fecurity of her government in the affections of her people, and in her fuperior credit with them.

E have now brought these remarks on the English history not only down to times little remote from our own, but to a period, when the monarchy fettled on a new foundation; upon which it still continues and rests more firmly than ever at this hour. The observations therefore, which remain to be made, in order to illustrate what hath been advanced, concerning the fpirit of liberty and the fpirit of faction, will for these reasons be the more apposite, the more affecting, and by confequence the more ufeful; but, for thefe very reasons likewife, it is probable that they will become the occafions of louder complaints, and of more impertinent clamor .--- We shall be fincerely forry for this; because we look on the alarm, which hath been taken at our endeavors to revive the fpirit, and to confirm and propagate the doctrines of liberty, in a country where liberty is still avowed, and under a government established on the principles of liberty, as a most fuspicious and melancholy fymptom. But the stronger this symptom appears, the more incumbent we fhall think it upon us to purfue the honeft defign, to which we have devoted ourfelves with conftancy and vigor.

The fhamelefs crew, who write against their country, as they would write against their God, for hire, shall have little regard from us. The fcandalous licence with which they have prefumed to draw odious parallels, and the impudence with which they have imputed these parallels to us, have been abundantly exposed already. The few, the very few things, which they have alledged in point of fact, or argument, have C c c c 2 been been often anfwered; perhaps too often, confidering how little weight they carried with them, and how little impreffion they were capable of making on the understanding, even of those, who had other reasons for inclining to that fide of the queftion. The ribaldry which thefe fcribblers employ, hath been and will continue to be defpifed, not anfwered. It cannot be expected that we fhould take notice of every little, frivolous, childish declamation, which appears in public, however fome perfons may demean themfelves by pretending to admire them. The menaces affectedly and infolently thrown out on one fide, and the flattery, fervilely offered on the other, are equally objects of our contempt; and if we take a little notice of the former, once for all, before we proceed any farther in these remarks, it is purely becaufe we cannot understand them to be the language of thefe writers. When they talk in this ftyle, they speak the language of him who guides their pens, and who is known to reward their labors. To him therefore it may not be improper to addrefs ourfelves in the following manner:

" The perfons, whom you threaten, fir, neither value your "favor, nor fear your anger. Whenever you attempt any "act of power againft any of them, you fhall find that you "have to do with men who know they have not offended the "law; and therefore truft they have not offended the king; "who know they are fafe, as long as the laws and liberties of "their country are fo; and who are fo little defirous of be-"ing fafe any longer, that they would be the firft to bury "themfelves in the ruins of the Britifh conflitution, if you, "or any minister as defperate as you, fhould be able to de-"ftroy it. But let us afk, on this occafion, what you are, "who thus prefume to threaten?---Are you not one, whofe "meafure of folly and iniquity is full; who can neither hold ""nor

" nor quit his power with impunity; and over whofe head " the long-gathering cloud of national vengeance is ready to " burft ?----Is it not time for you, fir, inftead of threatening " to attack others, to confider how foon you may be attacked " yourfelf ?---How many crimes may be charged upon you " and yours, which almost every man can prove; and how " many more are ready to ftart into light, as foon as the " power, by which you now conceal them, fhall determine ? " ---When next you meditate revenge on your adverfaries, " remember this truth: the laws must be deftroyed before " they can fuffer, or you efcape."

LET us now return to our fubject---In the early days of our government, after the Norman invation, the commons of England were rather formidable in their collective, than confiderable in their reprefentative body; by their numbers in extraordinary emergencies, rather than by ther weight in the ordinary courfe of government. In later days, they began to acquire fome of this weight by degrees. They reprefented grievances; they gave, or refufed fubfidies; and they exercifed, in a regular, fenatorial manner, the powers lodged in them by the conftitution; but still they did not obtain the intire weight, till they were wholly emancipated; and they were not so till the great change, which we are speaking of, happened. Before this time, they had too much of the dependency of tenants, and the king, the nobility and the clergy had too much of the fuperiority of landlords. This dependency of the commons added to that, which the crown frequently found means of creating, either by influencing their elections, or by corrupting their representatives, notwithstanding all the provisions made against it, which we have touched in a * former paper, kept this part of the legislature in fuch

a flate, as made it unable fully to answer the end of its institution; and the system of our government was by consequence, in this respect, defective.

COULD HENRY the feventh have found means, as he reduced the nobility lower, to have hindred the commons from rifing higher; could he have opened a way to the diminution of the property of the lords, and have prevented that increase of the fame property amongst the commons, to which, on the contrary, he gave occafion, and which time and accidents confpired to bring about; the ballance of this government would have been totally loft, tho' the outward forms of it had been preferved. Our liberty would have been loft by confequence; and our kings, with an house of lords and an house of commons, and all the appearances of limited monarchs, might have been as arbitrary as those princes are, who govern countries, where no fuch conftitution prevails. The reafon of this will appear plain to those who remember what hath been observed, in some of our former papers, that a dependent exercise of the powers, lodged in the two houses of parliament, will endanger, and may, more effectually than any other expedient, deftroy liberty; and that the prefervation of our freedom is no way to be fecured but by a free and independent exercife of these powers. Now such an exercise could not have continued, much lefs have been improved, if HENRY the feventh had been able, at the fame time, to weaken his nobility, and to keep his commons from acquiring new strength. But this was impracticable. At least, it was not attempted. HENRY the feventh haftened to the cure of that evil which preffed him moft, the power of the nobility, as his fon foon afterwards effectually reduced the exorbitant power of the clergy; and in pulling down thefe powers, which, as they were conflituted and had been exercifed. 2

ercifed, hurt the crown more than they ferved the people, thefe princes became the inftruments of raifing another power, which is the beft, if not the fole effectual barrier againft ufupations of illegal, and abufes of legal prerogatives; and which, at the fame time, can never be applied to do any real hurt to the crown, unlefs in cafes where it is bent and forced to do this hurt by the crown itfelf, in the first place, against the natural tendency and direction of it.

THIS increase of the property of the commons, by taking off from them a constant dependency of one fort, and by rendering them less obnoxious to an occasional dependency of another, gave greater dignity, and added greater weight in the ballance of government, to their representative body. The house of commons became more powerful, without the attribution of any new powers, and purely by the different manner in which their independency, the effect of their property, enabled them to exercise the same powers, which they enjoyed before. A concert with a few great lords, and a few leading prelates, was now no longer fufficient to guide the fense of parliament, and to establish the measures of government; no, not even in cafes, where this concert might be extended to fome of the commons themfelves. Intrigue and cabal became unneceffary, when the national interest was wifely purfued; and ineffectual, when it was not. The way was open to gain the parliament, by gaining the nation; but to impose on the nation, by gaining the parliament was hard ; for the weight without doors determined, in those days, the weight within. The fame caufes, which rendered the houfe of commons more confiderable to the court, to the nobility, to the clergy, to the commons themfelves, rendered likewife the whole body of the commons of more importance to those who 384 who were chofen to reprefent them. Befides which, the frequency of new elections, which was deemed an advantage, as long as the fervice was deemed an honorable burthen, gave the nation frequent opportunities of modelling the reprefentative body, according to the interefts and inclinations of the collective body. From hence it followed, that that credit and influence in the nation, which can only be acquired and preferved by adhering to the national intereft, became the fole means of maintaining a lafting credit and influence in the houfe of commons; upon which the harmony of government, and the happinefs of prince and people depended more than ever.

THUS were we brought back, in times very diffant and in circumftances very different, to the principles of government, which had prevailed amongft our Saxon anceftors, before they left Germany. Whatever particular pre-eminencies, or powers, were vefted in the principal men, the great affairs of flate were directed by the whole body of the nation.---De minoribus principes, de majoribus omnes.

SUCH were the natural effects of this new fettlement; and thus our limited monarchy became capable of as much perfection, as wifdom and favorable accidents can communicate to any human inflitution; for can we raife our ideas of this kind of perfection higher than ordering the diffribution of property and power in fuch a manner, that the privileges of the people and the prerogative of the crown cannot be taken away, unlefs with their own confent, or by their own fault? Now to this point of perfection was the conflitution of our government brought, and farther it could not be brought; becaufe it is impoffible to fecure either prince or people againft themfelves, or againft the effects of their own conduct.

HISTORY OF ENGLAND. 385

ONE part of what hath been faid upon this fubject will not, I think, be difputed. The other, perhaps, may feem a paradox; and a fettlement, which rendered our government more democratical, will not be readily allowed to have been advantageous to the crown, tho' it must be allowed to have been fo to the people.---Let us examine therefore whether it was really fo, or not.

In all limited monarchies, and we are not fpeaking of any other, the power of preferving thefe limitations muft be placed fomewhere. The queftion therefore is, whether it can be placed more advantageoufly, even for the crown as well as the people, than in the whole body of the nation.

WHILST the commons had not property enough to have any fhare in this power, the fole check, which could be opposed to the incroachments of the crown, was the power of the barons and of the clergy. But these two orders of men had their particular interests, frequently opposite to each other and to those of the people, as well as to those of the crown; fo that they were not only very incapable of forming a fecure barrier to liberty, but their power became terrible and dan-gerous to the crown itfelf. They flided eafily into faction. They often incroached on the prince's authority, whilft they refifted his incroachments, real or pretended, on their own privileges; and under the plaufible veil of law, or gofpel, private ambition had a greater fhare than public liberty in their contests. It is true, that during these contests, Magna Charta was figned and confirmed; and the condition of the people, in point of liberty, very much improved. But this was the accidental effect of the contests between the kings, the barons and the clergy, as we have remarked in fpeaking of those times, and not the natural effect of the property and power, lodged in the barons and the clergy. The commons were courted by all fides, becaufe they were wanted by all. Had they been bubbles enough to look on the nobility and clergy as the proper guardians of liberty, and to have adhered to them accordingly, they might indeed have avoided being flaves to their kings, but they would have rendered both their kings and themfelves little lefs than flaves to their temporal and fpiritual lords.

AFTER the reigns of Edward the first, and Edward the third, power came to be better poized, and our government took a more regular form. The prerogatives of our kings, and the privileges of our nobility, the authority and immunity of the church, and the rights of the people were more afcertained; and yet, after this time, the fame observations will hold good in a very great degree. It is certain that the vaft over-ballance of property and power, which still continued in the nobility and clergy, inftead of preventing, foftening, or fhortening the calamities which followed, helped to form and maintain those factions, which began, renewed, fomented the civil wars of York and Lancaster, as well as the wicked conduct of RICHARD the fecond, and the weak conduct of HENRY the fixth. Redrefs of grievances and fufficient fecurity against them for the future might have fatisfied the people, if they had been left to themfelves; but nothing lefs than revolutions of government could fatisfy the factions, into which the great men were divided, and into which they divided the nation, by their influence over the people, and by the advantages which the ill conduct of the Yorkifts and Lancastrians gave to each other.

THUS we fee how unfafely for the crown, as well as infecurely for the people, that property and power, which is neceffary ceffary to preferve the limitations of our monarchy, was placed before the time, when that great change in the one and the other happened, which makes the fubject of this difcourfe. But as foon as this change did happen, the crown was no longer exposed to the fame mifchiefs.

WHEN the little power, which HENRY the fourth of France had in the town of Rochelle, was objected to him, he made an anfwer worthy of his heroic fpirit. "I do, faid he, all I "defire to do there, in doing nothing but what I ought."---This moderation of temper is, in all governments, the beft, and, in limited monarchies, the only fure and durable foundation of power. By preventing jealoufy in the people of the prince, it takes away all advantage againft his government from faction; and the more watchful the people are over their liberties, the more fenfible will they be of this moderation, and the more grateful for it. Faction proceeds always without reafon; but it can hardly ever fucceed without pretence, and fufficient pretence will hardly be found under fuch a government.

WHEN a prince, who manifefts this moderation of temper, purfues the true intereft of his people, and fuffers no other intereft to come into any degree of competition with it, far from being the object of their jealoufy, he will be the principal object of their affection; and if he joins to this character of goodnefs that of ability, he will be the principal object of their confidence likewife. Thefe are the ftrongeft chains, by which a people can be bound to their prince; eafier indeed, but far ftronger than thofe of adamant, by which DIONYSIUS the elder boafted that he had fecured the tyranny of Syracufe to his fon; force, fear, a multitude of troops, and a guard of ten thoufand barbarians.---A prince, who eftablifhes his D d d 2 government on the principles of affection, hath every thing to hope and nothing to fear from his people. A prince, who establishes his government on any other principles, acts in contradiction to the very end of his inftitution. What objection therefore could be made, even on the part of the crown,, to a fettlement of property and power, which put the guardianship of liberty into fuch hands as never did, nor ever will invade the prerogative and authority of the crown, whilft they are employed to those purposes, for which alone they were intrusted? It is confessed that if a prince should attempt to establish his government on any other principle than these; if he fhould chufe to depend rather on deceiving, corrupting, or forcing his people, than on gaining their affection and confidence; he might feel the weight of their property and power very heavy in the scale against him. But then it must be confessed likewise that, in such a case, this opposition of the people would be just; and that the prince, not the people, would be answerable to himself and his family, to GOD and to man, for all the ill confequences which might follow.

WE hope that we have faid nothing, in order to fhew the excellency of our conflictution, as it fettled about the time of queen ELIZABETH, which is not agreeable to reafon; and fure we are that the truth of thefe general propositions will be confirmed by the particular examples which are to follow.---The reign of queen ELIZABETH will be one continued proof that the power of preferving the limitations of a monarchy cannot be placed better, for a good and wife prince, than in the whole body of the people; and that the fpirit of liberty will give greater ftrength, as well as procure greater eafe, to the government of fuch a prince, than any abfolute monarch can hope to find in the most abject fpirit, which principles of blind blind fubmiffion and paffive obedience are capable of infpiring.---The reigns immediately fucceeding this, will be one continued proof, that whenever the power of the people hath been exercifed against the crown, it hath been owing primarily to the weak management and obstinacy of the court, and to the unhappy choice which those princes made of governing by factions, in opposition to the fense and interest of the nation. From whence it will follow, that the great calamities which befel our country, in the middle of the last century, are unjustly charged on the spirit of liberty, or on the nature of the British constitution of government.

LETTER XIII.

HERE is no part of our annals, nor perhaps of the annals of any other country, which deferves to be more ftudied, or to be oftener called to remembrance both by thofe who govern, and by thofe who are governed, than the reign of queen ELIZABETH. We fhall not however defeend into all the observations which it affords; nor even into all those which might properly ferve to our prefent purpose.

In fome * papers we made a few remarks on this reign, and on that of king JAMES the first. We apprehend that the contrast between them appeared very ftrong on that occafion. This contraft will probably appear still much stronger, and by confequence be the more inftructive, when those remarks and these we are going to make come to center in one fingle point; to fhew that the conduct of queen ELIZABETH, under great disadvantages, produced all the good effects, which prince or people could defire; because it was wifely fuited to the nature of our government : whereas the conduct of king JAMES the first, who had many and great advantages which his predeceffor wanted, made his reign grievous to the people, uneafy to himfelf, and acceffory to those misfortunes which befel his fon; because it was illfuited to the nature of our government, and founded on principles destructive of liberty.

Few princes, no, not even her cotemporary HENRY the fourth of France, have been ever raifed to a throne under more difadvantageous circumstances, or have been furrounded in it with more complicated difficulties than queen ELIZABETH.---Let us take a general furvey of them.

THE division and animolity of parties had been carried to the heighth of religious rage. The cruelty of queen MARY's reign, in which much protestant blood had been shed, and even that of her sister with difficulty spared, rendered of course the perfecuting side more desperate, and the other more exasperated. It is hard to imagine that queen ELIZA-BETH had been able to cultivate many perfonal attachments to herfelf, before she came to the crown; except that of fir. WILLIAM CECIL, afterwards lord BURLEIGH, and perhaps one or two more. Her imprisonment for a time, and the great constraint under which she lived, during her sister's whole reign, gave her little opportunity for it; and the jealous eye, with which GARDINER and other ecclesiaftical zealots obferved her conduct, made it dangerous to attempt it.

In general, the proteftants defired her fucceffion : and the papifts feared it. But the former were under oppreffion, and even a kind of profeription. The latter had the whole authority of the church and the flate in their hands, in this kingdom; and that of Ireland, bigotted to popery and prone to rebellion, was at their devotion.--- The proteftants themfelves were divided, and those who meant equally a reformation, fell into the utmost afperity against each other, concerning the manner of making it, and the point to which it ought to be carried, on account of religion as well as of policy.

In this divided flate, and in the ferment which fuch divifions muft neceffarily caufe, queen ELIZABETH found the people whom fhe came to govern. Surely, a more nice and perilous ous flate can hardly be imagined; especially for her, who was led by inclination and determined by particular circumstances of interest to establish the reformation; that is, to declare for the weakest, tho' not the least numerous party.

IT is observed, I think by NATHANIEL BACON in his historical and political difcourfes, that the methods taken by HENRY the feventh to accumulate treafure, made a rich king indeed, but did not inrich the crown. His fon had feveral opportunities of doing both ; inftead of which he impoverished himself, the crown, and the people, by all the methods which the most wanton profusion could invent. He exhausted the wealth of the nation. He did more. He debased the coin, by mingling it with copper, and loaded the public with debts. These again were confiderably increased in the reign of Edward the fixth. Queen MARY was fo far from diminishing them, that one of the principal complaints against her administration, next to the cruelty fhe exercifed, was the great diffipation of the revenue, occasioned by her restitutions to the church, and by her new foundations of monasteries .--- In this low, incumbered state queen ELIZABETH found the revenues of the crown, and the wealth of the nation.

HER fituation abroad was still worfe than her fituation at home. Calais, and the other English possifiers in Picardy, had been lost in a quarrel, where the interest of England had no concern. For the fake of Spain, we had war with France. The war with Scotland still continued; and queen ELIZABETH had no one ally, on whose affistance she could depend.

SUCH diftreffed fituations are rare; and when they have happened, they have been often rendered lefs difficult in reality, than in appearance, by fome particular circumftances which

which have attended them. But when ELIZABETH began her reign, no fuch circumftances existed in her favor. On the contrary, almost every circumstance aggravated her distrefs. The thrones of France and Spain were filled neither by old men, worn out with age and cares; nor by weak men, unequal to their rank and bufinefs; nor by children, under the tuition of regents. HENRY the fecond reigned in France; PHILIP the fecond in Spain; princes, in the vigor of their age; of great ambition; of great talents; and feconded by the ableft ministers and generals in Europe. The French monarchy had been growing up from the time of LEWIS the eleventh, towards that fulnels of power and affluence of wealth, at which the Spanish monarchy was already arrived. Both thefe princes were, by bigotry and by policy, attached to the court of Rome; implacable enemies to the reformation; and fuch by confequence to queen ELIZABETH. HENRY the fecond had a farther reason for being fo. He grafped, in his ambitious views, the crown of England, as well as that of Scotland; and looked on queen ELIZABETH as the usurper of a right, belonging to his daughter-in-law. PHILIP, indeed, kept fome faint and affected measures with ELIZABETH, as long as he apprehended the union of fo many crowns in the house of Valois : but this apprehension was foon at an end; and even his fhews of friendship with it. HENRY the fecond, and his eldeft fon, FRANCIS the fecond, died in about two years. The deaths of these princes did, perhaps, diminish the difficulties and dangers to which queen ELIZABETH flood exposed on one hand; but then they increased these difficulties and dangers on the other; fince they took off all reftraint from PHILIP in purfuit of his enterprizes against her. His life lasted almost as long as hers, and his inveterate enmity as long as his life.

VOL. I.

ANOTHER

ANOTHER fource, from which difficulties and dangers were inceffantly arifing to queen ELIZABETH, lay in the objections which the papifts made to her title, on a principle of religion; and which were but too really, tho' indirectly, abetted by fome proteftants, on a principle of faction.---Whilft difputes about the fucceffion to the crown were confined to England, and turned on maxims of our own growth, if I may ufe that expreffion, we have feen how little regard was paid to the titles, and to the pretended divine, indefeafable right of princes. But when foreign nations came to be interefted in the fucceffion of our crown, they reafoned and they proceeded on other notions; not on those which both cuftom and law had eftablished here.

THE attacks of this kind, made on queen ELIZABETH, were the more grievous to her, becaufe they not only united the Roman-catholic powers againft her; but they made the divifions wider and more irreconcileable at home, where fhe placed the chief ftrength and fecurity of her government.

MARY queen of Scotland, was a pretender, neither abjured in England, nor difavowed and unfupported in other countrics. Sovereign of one part of the ifland, fhe had a powerful party in the other; wife of the dauphin, and after that queen of France; encouraged and affifted by her uncles, who poffeffed more than regal power in that kingdom; by Spain, and by the whole popifh intereft; fhe was juftly formidable to queen ELIZABETH, as long as fhe lived.----Another circumftance made her fo ftill more. The fuccefs of the reformation feemed to increase the zeal of those who continued in the communion of the church of Rome. The influence of the court of Rome became consequently ftronger at this point of time. It appeared both in France and in England too as powerful, powerful, tho' not as fuccefsful, here at leaft, as it had appeared in the eleventh century, in the days of the brave, but unfortunate emperor, HENRY the fourth, and of that infolent friar, GREGORY the feventh.----Even this circumflance may juftly feem to have been inforced by another; by the eftablifhment of the order of jefuits. This order, the offspring of a mad Spaniard, has had the principal honor, tho' other religious orders have endeavored to fhare it, of giving to the pope an authority like that which was exercifed by the king of the affaffins or the old man of the mountain, as he is called by fome of the French hiftorians; an authority, which proved fatal to HENRY the third, and HENRY the fourth of France; and which had like to have proved fo to queen ELIZABETH, and even to her fucceffor.

SUCH were the difficulties and dangers which encompaffed this princefs. The fituation of England, in her time, refembled that of a town powerfully befieged without, and expofed to treachery and fedition within. That a town in fuch circumftances, fhould defend itfelf, and even force the enemy, by it's own strength, to raife the fiege, hardly falls within the bounds of probability. But that all this should happen, and the inhabitants feel none of the inconveniencies of a long and obstinate fiege, nay, that they should grow opulent during the continuance of it, and find themselves at last better able to offend the enemy than they were at first to defend their walls, feems an adventure of some extravagant romance. But it conveys a true image of this reign .--- Unallied and alone, queen ELIZABETH maintained a glorious and fuccessful war against the greatest power and the richest potentate in Europe. She diftreffed him in the Weft-Indies. She infulted him in Spain. She took from him the empire of the fea. She fixed it in herfelf. She rendered all the projects of universal moarchy vain; and shook to the foundations the most exorbitant power which ever diffurbed the peace, or threatened the liberties of Europe. She supported the oppressed people of the Netherlands, against the tyranny of their prince. She fupported the protestant subjects of France, against CATHERINE of Medicis and her fons, those execrable butchers of their people. She fupported the kings of France, HENRY the third and fourth, against the ambition of the princes of the house of Lorraine, and the rebellious league of their popifh fubjects. She, who feemed to have every thing to fear in the beginning of her reign, became in the progress of it terrible to her enemies. The pretender to her crown loft her own. The Englifh, who appeared at first fo favorable to the queen of Scotland, became at last as defirous to facrifice the life of that unfortunate princels to the fecurity of queen ELIZABETH. Whilft war, confusion, and the miferies which attend them, raged in the dominions of those who bent their aim at the difturbance of her government; fhe preferved her fubjects in peace and in plenty. Whilft the glory of the nation was carried high by atchievements in war; the riches and the ftrength of it were raifed by the arts of peace to fuch a degree, as former ages had never feen, and as we of this age feel in the confequences .--- Well therefore might my lord BACON, fpeaking of queen ELIZABETH, fay, * " as for her government, I affure " myfelf I shall not exceed, if I do affirm that this part of " the island never had forty-five years of better times; and " yet not through the calmness of the seafon, but through " the wildom of her regiment."

HAVING made these remarks on the difficulties and on the fuccefs which attended queen ELIZABETH; it is time to confider the cause, which produced the stupendous effects of her reign. Now this cause is, I think, very plain. She was wife enough to fee clearly into the nature of that government, at the head of which the was placed; and to know that * " the " fupreme head of fuch a government owes a fupreme fervice to " the whole." She was wife enough to know that to be powerful, the muft either uturp on her people, deceive them, or gain them. The two first, she faw, were hard, dangerous and difhonorable. The laft, fhe faw, was eafy, fafe and glorious. Her head and her heart concurred to determine her choice. She made herfelf very foon the most popular perform in the kingdom. In her reign, the fenfe of the court, the fenfe of the parliament and the fenfe of the people were the fame; and whenever fhe exerted her own ftrength, fhe exerted the whole ftrength of the nation. Nothing fhe afked was ever refused by parliament; because she asked nothing which would have been refused by the people. She threw herfelf fo intirely on the affections of her fubjects, that fhe feemed to decline all other tenure of the crown. At leaft, the was not very folicitous about clearing her title to it by defcent. An act, declaring her right according to the order of fucceffion fettled in parliament thirty-five HENRY the eighth contented her; and fhe neglected the precaution, which her fifter had taken, in getting the act, which excluded them both from the crown, repealed, as far as it related to herfelf. The particular reasons of her conduct, in this case, might perhaps be gueffed at with more probability than they have been; but certainly one general reason outweighed them all in the mind of this heroical princefs. She knew that however the fubtlety of lawyers and political cafuifts might influence opinions, nothing but her own conduct could give her the hearts of her people. These she deemed her great security. These she acquired; and the little gloffes, which might have been put on her title, she despised. The being not only tied, but knit to.

her people was her aim; and the purfued this great point of view on all occafions; the leaft, as well as the greateft; and even on those, where she thought it necessary to refuse or to reprimand. Nature, as well as art, fitted her for this conduct. She had dignity without pride. She was affable, without finking into low familiarity; and when fhe courted her people, fhe courted them like a queen. This popularity was fometimes carried fo far, both in her manners, and in her expressions, that her enemies have endeavored to make it pass for grofs and fulfome affectation, and for fuch, indeed, it ought to have paffed if it had gone alone. It might have shocked, inftead of alluring, if it had not been feconded by every action of her life, and contradicted by none.---Let us now confider therefore, in fome inftances, what that conduct was, which convinced her people fo intirely of her goodnefs and her wifdom; and which procured her fuch large returns of gratitude, of duty, of affection and zeal.

LETTER XIV.

A FIRST and effential condition, towards obtaining the love and confidence of a free people, is to be neither feared nor defpifed by them. Queen ELIZABETH was, at no time, in any danger of the latter; and the foon put herfelf above all the fufpicions, which might have exposed her to the former. The only difference between her and her parliament, which carried any passion or unkindness with it, happened in the ninth year of her reign. It was founded on the apprehenfions of the dangers which would arife after her death, if the fucceffion was not fixed during her life. But we do not find the leaft infinuation of any jealoufy of her government; tho' the heat of both houfes, at that moment, was too great to have concealed any uneafinefs, which had lain at their hearts. That the was fond enough of her prerogative is certain; but then fhe took care that it fhould never be grievous; or that if it was fo, on fome occasions, to particular perfons, it should appear, by the occasions themselves, and by the manner of exercifing it, fpecious to the public .--- The prerogative certainly run high in those days. Her grandfather had raifed it by cunning, and her father by violence. The power of the privy council in civil affairs, and the cenforian power of the star-chamber in criminal affairs, as my lord BACON very properly stiles it, took too much of the pleas of the crown and of the common pleas out of their proper channels, and * " ferved rather to fcare men from doing wrong, than " to do any man right." ---- But the exercise of these powers.

having continued in four preceding reigns, the people were accuftomed to it; and care being taken to give no flagrant occafion of clamor against it, we are not to wonder if it was borne, without opposition or murmur, in a reign as popular as this.

The high-commiffion court, that we may quote another inftance, had no doubt very extraordinary powers. The bifhops, who held the principal fway in it, exercifed by thefe means two very great authorities at the fame time; one, as ordinaries in their diocefes; the other, as judges in this court; fo that they might fine and imprifon, as well as excommunicate and deprive. Now, it is not very probable, that the parliament, who thought the firft of thefe powers too much, as may be feen by the attempts made againft it, in the twenty-eighth year of this reign, were very well pleafed to fee the fecond in the fame hands. However, the fteadinefs of the queen, in maintaining this part of the prerogative, which had been given her, was the lefs unpopular, on account of the unfettled ftate of religion at this time; of the great moderation of the bifhops in thefe early days of the reformation; and of the prudent manner, in which the jurifdiction of the high-commiffion court was executed.

THE effects of a bare-faced prerogative are not the moft dangerous to liberty, for this reafon; becaufe they are open; becaufe the alarm they give is commonly greater than the progrefs they make; and whilft a particular man or two are crufhed by them, a whole nation is put on it's guard.---The moft dangerous attacks on liberty are thofe which furprife, or undermine; which are owing to powers, given under pretence of fome urgent neceflity; to powers, popular and reafonable, perhaps, at firft; but fuch as ought not to become g fettled and confirmed by a long exercise; and yet are rendered perpetual by art and management; and, in a great degree, by the nature of these powers themselves. Examples of this kind, might be produced from the Spanish and other histories. But queen ELIZABETH was far from fetting any fuch examples. She shewed her moderation, in defiring no fuspicious powers, as well as in the exercise of her prerogative; and this moderation was the more remarkable, becaufe no prince ever had the pretence of necessity to urge on ftronger appearances. Her whole reign may be almost called a state of defensive and offensive war, in England, as well as in Ireland; in the Indies, as well as in Europe. She ventured to go through this flate, if it was a venture, without the help of a standing army. The people of England had feen none," from the days of RICHARD the fecond; and this cautious queen might perhaps imagine, that the example of his reign and those of other countries, where standing armies were established, would beget jealousies in the minds of her people, and diminish that affection, which she esteemed and found to be the greateft fecurity of her perfon, and the greateft ftrength of her government. Whenever she wanted troops, her subjects flocked to her ftandard; and her reign affords most illustrious proofs, that all the ends of fecurity, and of glory too, may be answered in this island, without the charge and danger of the expedient just mentioned.

THIS affertion will not be contradicted by thofe, who recollect in how many places, and on how many occafions, her forces fought and conquered the beft difciplined veteran troops in Europe. Other examples might be brought to fhew how careful queen ELIZABETH was to avoid every thing which might give the leaft umbrage to her people. But we have faid enough on this head. Let us proceed to another.

THE conduct fhe held, with refpect to parties, deferves to be remarked; becaufe the moderation, the wifdom, and the equity, which fhe fhewed in it, contributed very much to cool the ferment in the beginning of her reign; by which fhe had time to captivate the good will of her people; to fettle her government; to eftablifh her authority; and even to change the national religion, with little contradiction, and without any diffurbance.

NOTWITHSTANDING all the indignities fhe had fuffered, and all the dangers fhe had run, before her acceffion, feveral perfons were reftored, and not a man was attainted in her firft parliament. The fteps I have mentioned being once made, fhe ftood on firmer ground, and had lefs to fear from the fpirit of faction. This clemency once fhewn, fhe could, more fafely and with greater reafon, exercife feverity, when the prefervation of the public peace made it neceffary.

THE peace of the kingdom was the ftandard, to which fhe proportioned her conduct. She was far from cafting herfelf with precipitation and violence even into that party which fhe favored, and on which alone fhe refolved to depend. She was far from inflaming their fpirits againft the adverfe party; and farther ftill from pufhing any fort of men, puritans, and even papifts, into defpair; or provoking them to deferve punifhment, that fhe might have a pretence to inflict it. She purfued her own fcheme fteadily; but fhe purfued it gradually; and accompanied it with all the artful circumftances which could foften the minds of men, and induce thofe, who were the moft averfe to her meafures, to bear them, at leaft patiently. On thefe principles fhe proceeded, in the whole courfe of her reign.

HISTORY OF ENGLAND. 403

To the papifts fhe ufed great lenity; till the bull of PIUS QUINTUS, and the rebellion, and other attempts, confequent upon it, obliged her to procure new laws, and execute more rigor. Yet even then fhe diftinguifhed * " papifts in con-" fcience from papifts in faction." She made the fame diftinction with regard to the puritans. " Their zeal was not " condemned; only their violence was fometimes cenfured;" until they attempted to fet up their own difcipline, in oppofition to that which had been eftablifhed by national authority; until their motives appeared to be " no more zeal, no more " confcience, fays fecretary WALSINGHAM, but meer faction " and divifion."

Thus cautious and fleady was the conduct of queen ELIZA-BETH towards parties; steady to the principle, and therefore varied in the application, as the behavior of parties towards her government varied; not as fuccefs abroad, or the change of fervants at home, might have influenced that of a prince of inferior abilities. What has been faid relates to parties in the nation; for as to parties at court, the conduct of this queen, tho' directed to the fame general end, feems to have been different. In the nation fhe chofe one party. She rendered the fystem of that party, the fystem of the whole. By this eftablishment, the other parties became fo many factions; and by the conduct we have defcribed, fhe defeated and difarmed these factions. At court, she countenanced and perhaps fomented the parties, which different characters, and different interests created. But however that was, she found means to attach them all to herfelf; and fhe found this benefit by keeping her ear open to them all, that the truth could not be concealed from her by the most powerful of her mini-

fters; as we have explained in a former letter, upon this fubject. On her acceffion to the throne, the retained thirteen of her fifter's counfellors, and ballanced them by no more than eight of her own religion. "On those, as well as on all others, "which the afterwards admitted into the miniftry, fays "CAMBDEN, the beftowed her favors with fo much caution, "and fo little diffinction, as to prevent either party from "gaining the afcendent over her; whereby the remained "miftrefs of herfelf, and preferved both their affections and "her own power and authority intire."

THE favors, by which the diffinguished the earls of LEI-CESTER and ESSEX, are not exceptions, in the course of fo long a reign, fufficient to deftroy the truth of this general observation. Besides, both these lords felt the weight of her difpleafure, nay one of them, the rigor of her juffice, when they prefumed too much on her favor, and fwerved from their duty. The fingular confidence which she placed in CECIL and fome others of her ministers, cannot be quoted in oppofition to it; for if she diffinguished them, it was rather by the labors, than the favors fhe heaped on them. She supported them indeed against their enemies; but then the merit of these men was far from being problematical. Their works teftified daily for them, in bold and well-concerted enterprizes; in wife, and well-conducted negotiations. The people reaped the benefit of their fervices, as well as the prince. They were justified in the nation,' as well as supported at court. In fhort, by this difcernment of spirits, by this skilful management of parties, without the help of military force, unlefs in actual rebellions, queen ELIZABETH preferved her people in tranquillity; tho' there paffed not an hour in her whole reign, without fome intrigue against her life, and the public peace.

HISTORY OF ENGLAND. 405

THIS moderation, in affuming and exercifing power, might have been illuftrated more, and evinced against all the little cavils made, and to be made, if we had not avoided too great prolixity. But it is time to hasten to the confideration of fome other parts of her conduct.

QUEEN ELIZABETH was accufed of avarice by her enemies; and perhaps fhe was fo by fome of her friends. Among that hungry crew, which attends all courts for the loaves and the fifhes, fhe could not efcape this charge. But furely, the nation had reafon to applaud her frugality. Her grandfather hoarded up riches. Her father diffipated them. The confequence under both thefe princes was, that every flight occafion became a fufficient pretence to afk for fubfidies; nay, they were afked and granted too, when even the flighteft occafion did not exift. They were afked by HENRY the feventh for wars which he never intended to make; and by HENRY the eighth for refifting invafions which were never defigned againft him. Thus was the nation equally opprefied by the avarice of one, and by the profufion of the other.

BUT queen ELIZABETH neither hoarded up, nor lavifhed away; and it is juftly to be queftioned whether any example of a prudent œconomy in private life, can be produced equal to that which fhe practifed in the whole management of her affairs. The famous BURLEIGH ufed to fay, that "he never "cared to fee the treafury fwell like a difordered fpleen, when "the other parts of the commonwealth were in a confump-"tion;" and his miftrefs thought that "money, in the pockets "of her fubjects, was better placed than in her own exche-"quer." Surely, thefe maxims were wife, as well as popular. If a prince amaffes wealth, to hoard it up, like HENRY the feventh, it is ufelefs to himfelf, and loft to the public. If he he fquanders it away, like HENRY the eighth, he will enrich particular men, and impoverish the state. But whilst these treasures remain in the purse of the subject, they circulate in commerce; they increase the common stock; and they increase by consequence the riches of a prince like queen ELIZA-BETH; for to such a prince this purse will be always open.

As immenfe as the expences were, which the found herfelf obliged to make from the moment the afcended the throne, the received nothing in taxes from her people till the fixth year of her reign. The taxes then given, were given by way of retribution; which was generally the method in her time. In former reigns, the people granted aids, not without a general communication at leaft of the ufes, to which they were to be applied; but often without a fufficient affurance that they thould be fo applied. In this reign that method of proceeding was inverted.

THE prince in the world who deferved to be trufted moft, defired to be fo the leaft. The aids which the had from her people, were not fo properly grants, as reimbursements of money, advanced for national fervices .---- And what fervices ? For establishing the protestant religion; for defending England; for refcuing Scotland; for carrying on a fuccefsful war against an opulent and potent enemy; for affisting the subjects and even the kings of France; for fupporting the people of the Netherlands; for refining the debafed coin; for paying all the debts, and reftoring the credit of the crown; for providing ammunition at home, which before this time we had been always obliged to purchase abroad; for improving both home and foreign trade; for rebuilding and augmenting the navy; and for doing all this, without any burthenfome impofition on the people; as the parliament more than once acknowledged. IT

IT was fo much a maxim of queen ELIZABETH, to fave for the public, not for herfelf; and to measure her riches by the riches of the nation, not by the treasures she had in her coffers; that fhe refused supplies offered, and remitted payments of supplies granted, when the found that the was able to carry on the public fervice without them. The two great principles of that æconomy, which enabled her to do fo much for her people, and to opprefs them fo little, feem to have been thefe. Firft, fhe made the most of her revenues; not by tormenting, and racking her fubjects, like HENRY the feventh, but by keeping a ftrict hand over her officers, and hindering them from enriching themfelves, either by direct fraud, or by a clandeftine. management, which may be justly termed indirect fraud, and is often more pernicious than the other .--- Secondly, fhe practifed that fuperior æconomy, of which we have spoken in a. former paper, with the utmost ability. What could be done by wifdom, or courage, fhe never attempted by money; nor expected that her fubjects fhould buy her out of difficulties. Strong at home, fhe affected little to lean on foreign help. As her alliance was often courted, and the feldom courted that of others, it was in her power, and fhe took the advantage, toengage in no expence, but fuch as the interest of her kingdom rendered immediately neceffary. To this interest alone. fhe proportioned her expence. This was the fole rule of her conduct. The Hugenots, whom the affifted in their first war, made their peace without her, and affifted to retake from her the places fhe had bargained for with them; yet fhe helped them, in the wars which followed, with her troops, her fhips, and her money. The Dutch had given her no caufe to complain of their behavior. Yet when France abandoned them at the treaty of Vervins, and they had no support but hers remaining, the made a new bargain with them, and leffenede heri her own charge; becaufe fhe knew they were able, at that time, to fupply the deficiency.

In all thefe expences, fhe was careful neither to flarve nor overfeed the caufe, while it lafted; and fhe frequently flipulated a repayment; which fhe might exact afterwards, if fhe found reafon fo to do; or which fhe might remit, and thereby create a fecond obligation to her, if fhe found her account in fuch an inflance of generofity. Queen ELIZABETH was not only thus frugal for her people, but perpetually attentive to the methods of enriching them. In the very first parliament which fhe held, amidft the most important affairs; fuch as the fettlement of the crown on her own head; the change of religion, and the eftablishment of the church, regulations for the improvement of trade, and increase of fhipping were not forgot.

WE might purfue the fame obfervation through the whole courfe of her reign, both in parliament, and out of it; and fhew, in numberlefs inftances, how fhe rofe to the higheft, and defcended even to the loweft circumftances, which in any degree affected the trade and navigation of her fubjects. We might fhew the advantages fhe took in thefe refpects, not only of the faults committed by other governments, but of the misfortunes of other countries. In a word, we might fhew how war itfelf, one of the greateft public calamities, inftead of impoverifhing, became a fource of riches to this nation, by the manner in which fhe made it.

But these particulars would carry us beyond the bounds we have prescribed to ourselves. In general, it will not be denied that, beside the spirit of industry, which exercised itself

at home, queen ELIZABETH raifed and pushed to the highest degree, by the protection and encouragement she gave, a fpirit of difcovering new countries; making new fettlements; and opening new veins of trade. The force of this first impreffion has lasted long amongst us. Commerce has thrived under neglects and discouragement. It has subfisted under oppressions and obstructions; and the spirit of it is not yet extinguished by that of ftockjobbing; tho' the spirit of flockjobbing be to that of trade, what the spirit of faction is to that of liberty. The tendency of both is to advance the interest of a few worthless individuals, at the expence of the whole community. The confequence of both, if ever they prevail to the ruin of trade and liberty, must be, that the harpies will flarve in the midft of imaginary wealth; and that the children of faction, like the iron race of CADMUS, will deftroy one another.

BEFORE queen ELIZABETH's reign, the commerce of England was confined and poor. In her reign, it extended itfelf over all the known, and even into the unknown parts of the world. We traded to the north, and opened our paffage into Mufcovy. We carried our merchandife up the Duina, down the Volga, and a-crofs the Cafpian fea into Perfia.

OUR merchants visited the coafts of Africa; all the countries of the Grand Seignior; and following the tracks of the Venetians into the East-Indies, they foon followed the Portuguese thither by the cape of Good Hope. They went thither through the South Sea, and failed round the world. In the West-Indies, they not only traded, but established themselves, in fpight of all the power of Spain.

BEFORE queen ELIZABETH's reign, the fleet of England was fo inconfiderable, that even in the days of her father, if I miftake not, we were forced to borrow, or hire fhips of Hamburgh, Lubec, Dantzick, and other places.

IN her reign, it foon grew to fuch a number and ftrength, that it became terrible to the greatest maritime powers of Europe.

ON fuch foundations were the riches and power of this kingdom laid by queen ELIZABETH; and thefe were fome of the means fhe employed to gain the affections of her fubjects. Can we be furprifed if fhe fucceeded?

O<sup>UEEN</sup> ELIZABETH fucceeded in gaining the affections of her fubjects, not only by the conduct which fhe held at home, but by that which fhe held in the management of the national intereft abroad.

WE have endeavored to explain fome particulars of the former. It remains that we give the leaft imperfect ideas we are able of the latter, and that we apply the whole great example of this reign, to confirm the doctrines we have advanced.

QUEEN ELIZABETH could not have eftablished and preferved, as she did, the tranquillity of her people in the midst of disturbance, nor their fecurity in the midst of danger, if she had not taken some share in the general affairs of Europe. She took therefore such a share as the interest of England neceffarily required at that time; and she conducted herfelf in the management of it with wisdom and address superior to any of her predecess.

HER fifter had been rendered by bigotry an egregious bubble to the court of Rome. Perfuaded by her hufband, and deceived by her minifters, fhe was fo likewife very fatally in the quarrel, which broke out between France and Spain. The parliament, in affenting to her marriage with a foreign prince, had imposed fuch conditions, as were judged fufficient to preferve the conflictution of the government, and the independency of the kingdom.

PHILIP had fworn to the obfervation of these conditions. Such of them, as he had not either time, or opportunity, or temptation to break, were observed; but the others proved too weak to hold him. Thus, for inftance, we do not find that he enriched himself at the expence of England. He is faid, on the contrary, to have brought hither very great treafures; and his father had trufted the distribution of an immense fum to GARDINER: fo that if he bribed the nation, it was with his own money, not theirs; but he engaged the nation in a war with France, because France broke with Spain; notwithstanding the express condition made by parliament, * " that the match should not at all derogate from " the league lately concluded betwixt the queen of England " and the king of France, but the peace should remain invi-" olate between the English and the French."

THIS facrifice of the national to a foreign intereft coft us Calais; a conqueft, which the French looked upon as a compenfation for near two hundred other places, which they were obliged by the treaty of Cambray, to give up to PHILIP. Boulogne had been facrificed in the preceding reign, not to a foreign intereft, but to that of the minifter, DUDLEY earl of Warwick, afterwards duke of Northumberland. The people were willing and able to affert their right, and to defend their pofferfion; but the fituation of the minifter, and the fchemes of private intereft, which he was carrying on at home, required that he fhould avoid, at any rate, a war, even a defenfive war. In fhort Boulogne, for which France had engaged to give two millions, was delivered up for four hundred thoufand crowns; and the very fame minifter, who had oppofed with violence all the public confiderations, urged by

WE have faid enough, in a former letter, concerning the wild conduct of HENRY the eighth in foreign affairs; and there is no need of going any farther back. These examples are fufficient to shew the opposition between that of queen ELIZABETH and that of her predecessors. She was neither deceived, like them, by her ministers; nor betrayed by her paffions, to ferve any other interest at the expence of England.

IT would be eafy to prove, from many inftances, how careful fhe was to avoid every thing, which might even warp the fteady tenor of her conduct in this refpect. As long as fhe had no real intereft diftinct from that of the country fhe governed, fhe knew that no fictitious intereft could be imposed on her. She kept herfelf therefore clear of any fuch real intereft, and thought that the crown of England deferved her fole, her undivided care.

MUCH has been faid of her behavior in all the treaties of marriage propoled to her. We shall not engage in that difquifition. But this, we think, cannot be controverted; that if ever she was in earness refolved to marry, she was so when the articles of marriage between her and the duke of ANJOU were figned. It is hardly possible, as RAPIN observes, to account for her conduct on this occasion by any other principle. Now upon this supposition, what motive could determine her to break this match in so abrupt a manner? The reasons urged by CAMBDEN, and other writers in general, prove too much. They ferve rather to prove that the should not have entered into these engagements at all, than to account for her 414 her breaking them as fhe did. But among the reafons, on which WALSINGHAM infifted, when he was fent into France upon this occafion, we may obferve one in particular, founded on a fact, which happened after the figning of the articles; and which accounts for the queen's conduct in this cafe agreeably to principles, on which fhe proceeded in all others. The duke of ANJOU had accepted the fovereignty of the low countries. By this ftep, he had engaged himfelf in a war with Spain; and the queen would not, on his account, engage her people in it, * " defiring nothing more than " that by this marriage the realm might be preferved in " peace and tranquillity."

SHE might incline to marry this prince, under all the limitations and referves contained in the articles, whilf he had no dominions on the Continent; and yet flart backwards and refolve to break the match, as foon as fhe faw him actually poffeffed of the fovereignty of the Low Countries.

NAY, if we fhould fuppofe, againft hiftorical probability, that fhe never defigned to confummate her marriage, tho' fhe entered into articles, yet there will ftill remain no reafonable way of accounting for the fudden refolution fhe took of breaking at this precife point of time; unlefs we fuppofe, that fhe thought this reafon the ftrongeft and the moft unanfwerable of all thofe which could be urged in excufe of a meafure liable to feveral objections, and fome very inconvenient contingencies.

THERE were few things, which fhe had more at heart than refcuing the Netherlands from the Spanish yoke; and there was nothing in the whole extent of foreign affairs, to which fhe gave greater attention. Even at this time, fhe fupplied the duke of Anjou with very confiderable fums, for the fupport of his enterprize; and about four years afterwards, fhe efpoufed more openly the caufe of thefe provinces, by making a treaty with the States, and by fending an army to their affiftance. But as fhe would not marry a prince who was their fovereign, fo fhe would not accept this fovereignty, when it was offered directly to her. She perfifted in avoiding an engagement, which might in it's confequence carry her farther than the intereft of England required; or oblige her to make greater efforts than were confiftent with that eafy and florifhing ftate, in which fhe refolved to preferve her own people.

MUCH more might be faid; but this may fuffice to fhew what the first and fundamental principle was, by which queen ELIZABETH governed herfelf in all foreign affairs. She considered the interest of no kingdom, no state, nor people, no not even the general interest of the reformation, as zealous a protestant as she was, nor the prefervation of a ballance of power in Europe, as great an heroine as fhe was, in any other light than relatively to the intereft of England. She affifted, or opposed, she defended or attacked, just as this interest directed; and the degree, to which it was concerned, was the exact and conftant measure to which the proportioned her good, and her ill offices, her friendship, and her enmity. She was diverted from this principle of conduct neither by weaknefs, nor ftrength of mind; neither by fear, nor hope; neither by pufillanimity, nor courage; neither by moderation, nor ambition.

WE may conclude this head, by venturing to affirm that, in the whole courfe of her reign, there was not a penny of 5 English English money spent, nor a drop of English blood spilt, except where it was necessary to keep off from this nation some real, visible disadvantage.

QUEEN ELIZABETH's policy was deep; and the means fhe employed were often very fecret; but the ends to which this policy and thefe means are directed, were never equivocal. Let us now defcend into fome particular inflances of the wifdom and addrefs, with which fhe purfued this great principle.

THESE particulars may be reduced properly, we think, under two general heads. The first is this; " she watched the " ebbs and flows of the power and interest of Europe; the " viciflitudes and fluctuations in the affairs of peace and " war." We use the words of a * late writer, but shall make a very different application of them.

THIS uncertain, varied, fhifting fcene was fo far from being the caufe of bad meafures, or the excufe for bad fuccefs, at the time we are fpeaking of, that it was the very fource from whence queen ELIZABETH derived those opportunities, which the improved fo gloriously. A weaker council than hers might have been puzzled, and weaker heads might have been turned by fo confused a state of affairs. Unable to steer steadily through fo many difficulties, every current would have carried such men along with it. Every blass of wind would have driven them before it. Perpetually tossed about, at the mercy of every event, they must have lived from day to day, or from hour to hour.

IF the kingdom had escaped intire destruction in this forlorn condition, it must have been by miracle, and without any merit

merit on the part of those who governed; but this intire deftruction would much more probably have followed, after a long feries of calamities; without any other excuse on their part, than that of charging the catastrophe to the account of fortune, the common fcape-goat of unskilful ministers.

THE conduct and the fuccess of queen ELIZABETH and her ministers were very different. She managed France, until she had taken such measures, as left her less to fear from Scotland; and she managed Spain, until she had nothing left to fear from France.

SHE knew what defigns HENRY the fecond built on the pretenfions of his daughter-in-law, MARY queen of Scotland; and no one, who confiders the hiftory of this time, nay, even as he finds it deduced by RAPIN himfelf, will be of his mind, that fhe expected to " enjoy great tranquillity by the peace," which fhe made foon after her acceffion to the throne, with France and Scotland.

But the making this treaty gave her time, which was of the utmost importance to her to gain, abroad as well as at home, in the beginning of her reign. The manner in which she made it, gave her reputation likewise; and she was wise enough to know of what real advantage reputation is, and how much that of a prince depends on the first steps he makes in government.

SHE practifed in this negotiation a rule, which fhe obferved to the laft. How much foever PHILIP refented her proceedings at home, it was plain he could not abandon, at that time, her interefts abroad. The point of honor, drawn from the confideration that England had entered into the war for the Vol. I. H h h fake of Spain, did not probably weigh much with him; but the pretentions of France gave him a juft alarm; and the fame reafons, which are faid to have induced him to fave her life, when the was princefs, flood in force to make him fupport her, now the was queen, againft the power of France. Notwithftanding this plaufible confideration, queen ELIZABETH refolved to treat for herfelf, and by herfelf. "She was of opinion, "fays CAMBDEN, that it would not redound to the honor of "England, or herfelf, to be reduced to the neceffity of fup-"porting her interefts by a dependence on Spain." She exerted the fame fpirit, and behaved herfelf with the fame dignity, on a very remarkable occafion, and in a very nice conjuncture, at the latter end of her reign; at the treaty of Vervins.

SHE defpifed the offers made her by HENRY the fourth. She refolved to continue the war, and to fupport alone the flates of the Low Countries, rather than to fuffer the man in the world, who had the greateft obligations to her, to treat for her.---True it is, that fhe had reafon to be diffatisfied with his behavior; but befides that, the good underftanding between this prince and PHILIP the fecond being promoted by the court of Rome; it is poffible queen ELIZABETH might think fuch negotiators, as were devoted to that court, not quite fo proper to be trufted with the interefts of her kingdom.

As foon as HENRY the fecond was dead, and his fon FRANers the fecond, a young and in every fenfe a weak prince, was on the throne of France, fhe acted with lefs referve and caution. The treaty, which had been privately negotiated. before with the malecontents of Scotland, was now figned; her army marched to their affiftance; the French were driven out of that kingdom; the reformation was folemnly and legally eftablished there; and queen ELIZABETH was the avowed g. defender of the liberties, privileges, and religion of the Scotifh nation---FRANCIS the fecond lived a very fhort time, and died without leaving any children. The fear therefore of an union of the crowns of England and Scotland with that of France, terrified PHILIP the fecond no longer. Queen ELI-ZABETH had therefore the more to fear. The court of France had ftill the fame bigotry, and the fame hatred to her; tho' not the fame pretentions. The court of Spain could be now no more reftrained, by any political confideration, from purfuing those defigns against her, even in conjunction with France, which no other confideration had hitherto retarded.

The projects formed and the engagements taken between these powers, at the congress at Bayonne, were not absolute fecrets. She felt the effects of them every day, in conspiracies against her government, and even her life. Too weak to defend herfelf by force on fo many fides, fhe defended herfelf by ftratagem; improved every incident; and took fome advantage of every turn. She contented herfelf to countermine the intrigues of the courts of Rome, of France, and of Spain. With the first she kept no measures, because she could have no war: With the two laft fhe kept all measures to prevent one. Tho' queen ELIZABETH's whole reign was properly a state of war, and there was no point of time in it, where she was free from all attacks, private as well as public, indirect as well as direct; yet the first twenty-five years of her reign may be faid, in one fense, to have been neither a state of war, nor a state of peace; because both fides pretended to look on the treaties of peace as fubfifting; and either difavowed, or excufed the hostilities reciprocally committed, not constantly, but occasionally committed. If she had fallen into this state from that of a fettled peace, difentangled from all pretenfions, either of her own upon others, or of others upon her, there Hhh 2 would would be no occasion to admire her conduct. But that the fhould be able, when the neither had, nor could have a fettled, fecure peace with her neighbors, to ftand fo long on the. flippery verge of war, and avoid the neceffity of engaging directly in it, till fhe was in a condition of doing fo with fuccefs, is justly matter of the greatest admiration .--- If she had only aimed to keep off the evil day, it might at last have come upon her with a double weight of misfortune. If she had only gained time to prolong furpence, fhe might have loft opportunities; wasted herstrength; tired, jaded and exhausted. her people. But this was far from being the cafe. She was. in this state by good, not by bad policy; and she made the ufe fhe defigned of it. She difappointed, divided, and weakened her enemies. She prepared the opportunities which the afterwards improved. She united, animated, and enriched her people; and, as difficult as that may feem to be for a prince in fuch a fituation, the maintained her own dignity; and fupported the honor of the nation .--- To exemplify all. these particulars, would be to write her history; but it is neceffary to fay fomething upon them.

OF the two powers abroad, from whom alone fhe had any thing to apprehend, and with whom fhe was principally concerned, France gave her the leaft and the fhorteft trouble. CHARLES the ninth came a minor to the crown. Two factions, drunk with religious enthufiafm, and headed by men of the moft defperate ambition, defolated the kingdom. The queens mother blew up the flames firft; and tried in vain afterwards. to extinguifh them, by a deluge of blood. Queen ELIZA-BETH, who had probably encouraged the famous confpiracy of Amboife, which broke out juft before the death of FRANCIS the fecond, continued to abet and fupport the proteftant party; but ftill fubordinately to fuch meafures, as her fituation, ation, relatively to Scotland, or Ireland, or Spain, obliged her to keep with CHARLES the ninth. Thefe meafures were fometimes fuch, and even after the maffacre of St. BARTHOLOMEW, as the zeal of the Huguenots could hardly forgive her. But the went wifely and fleadily on to her own purpofes.

" Non ponebat enim rumores ante falutem."

WHEN HENRY the third came to the crown, and the league was once formed, the grown of France wanted her affiftance, and had it; and as powerful as the princes of the house of Lorraine were, they could give her little open diffurbance; unless they prevailed in their wicked, and almost chimerical projects in France. With these princes, and their faction therefore the never kept any measures; as they never kept any with her. As politic a prince as PHILIP the fecond is effeemed to have been, he was amufed by the regard which queen ELIZA-BETH affected fometimes for his perfon, and always for the treaties fubfifting between them; and he loft the opportunities in which he might have attacked her with advantage. The flow councils of Spain, and the flower execution of them, produced opportunities, which her fagacity and vigor improved. The fupport the gave to the Huguenots made the Spaniards afraid of provoking her, by too hafty and direct attacks, to give the fame fupport to the people of the Low Countries. She turned their game against them, and acted in the Low Countries in the fame manner as they aded in Ireland, and even in England ; but with better effect. From the year 1577 fhe began to favor this revolt; and in the year 1'585 fhe made a formal. treaty with the States. Such of these measures as could be concealed, fhe concealed. Such of them as could not be concealed, the excufed, or endeavored to juffify and reconcile with the treaties between Spain and England.

As the time fhe gained, and the diverfions fhe gave by this management, put it quite out of the power of France, and made Spain lefs able to hurt her; fo they alone put it in her power to fettle her government, and to do all the great things at home, of which we have fpoken in other papers *. We fhall not repeat them here; but fhall conclude this head by obferving, in an example or two, how fhe maintained her own dignity in other cafes, befides that of treating, which is taken notice of above, and how fhe fupported the honor of the nation, and the interefts of her fubjects.

DURING the time fhe was the most careful to avoid a war with Spain, and had the most reason to be so; even in the year 1568, whilft those revolutions, which broke out foon afterwards, were preparing, she would not fuffer the least injury to be offered to any of her fubjects with impunity. Some veffels and effects, belonging to an English merchant, had been feized by the Spaniards in the West-Indies. She did not make war upon this; but she foon found and feized an opportunity of refenting the infult. She laid her hands on very great fums of money, claimed indeed by Genoese merchants, but sent to the Low Countries, and defigned, no doubt, for the Spanish fervice there. The duke of ALVA feized, in return, the perfons and effects of the fubjects of England; and the immediately made reprifals on those of the Flemmings. What compofition was made with the Genoefe does not, I think, appear; but as the feizure was to the difappointment and loss of Spain, fo the composition was probably to the advantage of England; fince, at this very time, queen ELIZABETH discharged the debts contracted by her father and brother to foreigners. As to the effects of the Netherlands, the returned the overplus of the value, after having repaid to her own fubjects the full amount of their loffes. She carved for her people; and would not leave it to a difpute, what reparation they fhould have; much lefs whether they fhould have any reparation, or not.

SUCH a conduct as this, which fhe held, even whilft fhe kept meafures with Spain, and avoided a war, foretold what might be expected from her, and what fhe actually performed, when fhe thought it no longer expedient to keep the fame meafures. But this will come, with other reflections, more properly under the next general head; to which we think that the particular inftances of queen ELIZABETH's wifdom and addrefs, in the management of foreign affairs, may be reduced.

TF queen ELIZABETH confidered every former intereft relatively to the intereft of England, the confidered likewife every measure to be taken in foreign affairs relatively to the fituation of England. This we establish as the fecond general head, to which the particular inftances of her wisdom and address, in the management of foreign affairs, may be properly reduced.

SHE confidered herfelf as queen of a country cut off from the Continent, and feparated by the fea from all other countries, except Scotland. Her conduct therefore towards Scotland was very different, in many refpects, from that, which fhe held towards every other nation.---A due obfervation of thefe different principles, on which queen ELIZABETH proceeded in the divided flate of our ifland, may ferve to fet, in a ftronger and clearer light, that fingle principle which remains to be followed in our united flate.

THE fituation of an ifland affords great advantages, when they are wifely improved; and when they are neglected, as great difadvantages may refult from this very fituation.---The reign, now before us, is a glorious and unanfwerable proof that the halcyon days, fo much boafted of, and fo feldom found, days of profperity, as well as peace, may be enjoyed in an ifland, whilft all the neighbouring continent is filled with alarms, and even laid wafte by war. But our own hiftories will fhew us likewife, how an ifland may approach, as it were, too near the cantinent, and be fatally drawn into that great vortex.

vortex. Left we fhould ramble too widely in the large field which opens itfelf, let us confine our reflections to fome of those different means and objects, either of defence, or offence, which nature, improved by art, prefents to people who inhabit islands, or to people who inhabit the continent, according to their different fituations. A powerful navy is of indifpenfable neceffity to the former of thefe. Without it, they must be poor and exposed. With it, they may be rich and fecure. Barriers of fortified towns, and great flanding armies are of the fame necessity to the latter. Without this fecurity, they lie open to every inroad, and at the mercy of every neighbor. With it, they may be fafe from foreign danger, and even terrible to those who live round them. But then, as the fea is a barrier of no expence, and as a maritime force carries no domeftic danger along with it, but enriches the community it defends, fo a fortified barrier, and a regular army, which are neceffary to fecure a nation fituate on the continent against foreign danger, carry great domestic inconveniencies, and even dangers too, along with them. Both of them, like armor, too heavy to be borne, wafte the ftrength of those who are covered by them; and an army, like a fword, which recoils on the blow, may wound the conftitution it was meant to defend .--- But farther: as particular families, by uniting together, formed larger focieties, for their common defence, and gave rife to the kingdoms, and ftates, which have appeared in the world ; fo thefe larger focieties have, ever fince, found it neceffary, or advantageous, to unite together in various manners; fometimes by an entire union, or an incorporation of different people into one body politic; fometimes by a partial, or fæderal union of diftinct states in one common cause ; and at all times by alliances, made on particular occafions, and fuggested by a real or seeming conformity of interests. This occafional union, by alliances with other states, of which alone

we are to fpeak in this place, is fo neceffary to all the nations on the continent, that even the moft powerful cannot fubfift without it; and those who manage it beft, are accounted wifeft. Their feveral interests are the objects of their alliances; and as the former are fubject to change, the latter must vary with them. Such variations, whether occasioned by the course of accidents, or by the passions of men, tho' made by a few, will affect many; because there always are, and always must be, fystems of alliances subfissing among these nations; and therefore, as a change in fome of the parts of one fystem neceffarily requires a change in all the rest; fo the alteration of one fystem neceffarily requires an alteration of the others.

THUS are they always toffed from peace to war, and from war to peace. Perpertual negotiation is the life and foul of their governments. Their well-being, nay their fafety at home, requires that they fhould be always bufy abroad. It is neceffary for them to be mediators, arbitrators, or, which is infinitely worfe, guaranties; to be contracting parties in preliminary, provifional, or explanatory treaties; in defensive, or offensive alliances; by which means they get over daily difficulties, by the multiplication of lafting incumbrances.

THE interfering and clashing of their rights and pretenfions, and the various obligations, by which they ftand bound to one another, appear to be and are the immediate caufes of all thefe difputes and contentions. But the principal and remote caufe arifes from the proximity and other circumftances of their fituations. That neceffity, or advantage, which gave occafion to the original engagements, has maintained and multiplied them fince; and the laft would not be reafonable, if the firft had not been neceffary.

HERE then arifes an effential difference between those objects, which are proper to the policy of an island, and those which are fo to the policy of the continent; a difference greatly to the advantage of the former; the circumftances of whose fituation not requiring fo constant and intimate an union with other states, either for defence or offence, render unnecessary a great part of the engagements which prove fuch heavy and lasting incumbrances on the latter.

AN island under one government, advantageously situated, rich in itfelf, richer by it's commerce, can have no neceffity, in the ordinary course of affairs, to take up the policy of the continent; to enter into the fystem of alliances we have been fpeaking of; or, in fhort, to act any other part than that of a friendly neighbor and a fair trader. If an extraordinary crifis happens on the continent, which may endanger the fafety even of those who are separated from it, such as we faw at the beginning of the prefent century, felf-prefervation will no doubt determine men, as it ought, to unite by ftricter alliances with those powers with whom they are occasionally united by a more immediate interest; but even in this case, neither will felf-prefervation require, nor good policy fuffer, that fuch a people should enter deep into the quarrels, or involve themfelves intricately, much lefs continually, in the political fchemes of the continent. We pass over offensive cases, because it is manifest that the people of an island can have no interest in making foreign acquifitions; and that therefore it would be abfurd in them to fpend their blood and treasure in acquiring only for others; or to attack any farther than is neceffary to defend.

WE confine ourfelves to the cafe of defence before-mentioned; and upon that we fay, a people on the continent may I i i 2 have have reafon to engage as deeply in defence of another country, as if they defended the walls of their own towns, or the doors of their own houfes; becaufe another country may be the fole barrier of their own. But this can never be reafonably done by the people of an ifland, who have another, and a better barrier than any the continent can form for them. Such a people are to look on their engagements with other countries, as on outworks caft up in hafte, which may ferve to defeat a weak attack, or to delay and difappoint a ftrong one. But it would be the height of folly in them, even in one of thofe extraordinary conjunctures, which we now fuppofe, to lay the whole ftrefs of their defence here; to fpend their ftrength improperly; and to forego thofe advantages which nature has given them.

THE nations on the continent might teach them another lefton. They are careful to employ every advantage of their fituation; a river; a lake; a ridge of mountains; and fhall the inhabitants of an ifland neglect the fea? Shall they do by choice all which other nations are obliged to do by neceffity? Surely not, and if at any time fuch a conduct can be proved neceffary to certain purpofes, we think it will refult from this proof, that fuch purpofes fhould be laid afide, not that fuch meafures fhould be purfued.

THESE reflections, with others of the fame kind, prefent themfelves naturally to those who confider the conduct of queen ELIZABETH, and the events of her reign. We may therefore conclude that they were, at least, some of the principles of her government.

How fhe formed, or rather how fhe protected, and aided a party, already formed in Scotland, on principles of religion and and liberty, has been obferved; as well as the fuccefs of this meafure, by which the troops of France were driven out of that kingdom, and the influence of France on the government was either removed, or guarded againft. To maintain and improve this advantage, was the great affair of her life. England was, with refpect to Scotland, like a kingdom on the continent, and queen ELIZABETH employed, with refpect to Scotland, all the policy of the continent.

WE find her bufy on that fide in almost every page of her history; almost always negotiating, and always intriguing. A friend, an enemy, a mediatrix, an umpire, a guarantee, she played every part, which might keep others from hurting Scotland, and Scotland from hurting her. Her armies were at all times ready to march, and her fleets to fail thither. As flrict an æconomy as she practifed every where else, she was profuse there; but her profusion turned to account, and therefore deferves another name. There may be such schemes, such management, and fuch fucces, as may render even the smalless expense, profusion; but those of queen ELIZABETH were sufficient to justify the greatess. The fecret fervice of her reign was private in transaction and public in effect; not equally inferutable in both.

ABOUT the fourteenth year of her reign, fhe had brought the affairs of Scotland to fuch a pafs, that fhe feemed to have nothing to fear from that quarter. The plots, in favor of queen MARY, had been difcovered; the infurrections defeated; and the duke of NORFOLK executed in England. In Scotland, the fame party was broken. The carl of MORTON, a man abfolutely devoted to queen ELIZABETH, was regent; the caftle of Edinburgh was taken; the civil war was finished with complete fucces; and she enjoyed great tranquillity; becaufe, according according to RAPIN's obfervation, fhe could now be only attacked by fea; that is, fhe had now the whole advantage of an ifland.

This happy flate did not continue long without interruption. MORTON loft, and reaffumed his power, was difgraced, profecuted, and at last beheaded. King JAMES had taken very young the government of this kingdom; and young, as well as old, was governed by his favorites. The party of his mother in Scotland did not indeed rife again, fo as to give queen ELIZABETH any umbrage. But his general character, and his behavior on fome particular occafions, the character of his favorites, and the intrigues they were known to carry on, obliged her to reaffume, if she had ever laid it aside, and to purfue her antient conduct towards Scotland. She purfued it to the end of her reign: and altho' king JAMES, when he had more experience, and was better advised, kept fuch measures with her, as were neceffary to fecure and to facilitate his fucceffion ; yet this wife queen continued to give quite another attention to the affairs of Scotland, than the gave to those of any other country; or would have given to thefe, if Scotland had been divided from England by the fea.

It is impofible to make thefe reflections, and not to reflect, at the fame time, on that happy change which the union of the two kingdoms has brought about. We are now one nation under one government; and muft therefore always have one common intereft; the fame friends, the fame foes, the fame principles of fecurity, and of danger. It is by confequence now in our power, to take the intire advantage of our fituation; an advantage, which would make us ample amends for feveral which we want, and which fome of our neighbors poffefs; an advantage which, conftantly attended to, and wifely improved, would would place the British nation in fuch circumstances of happinefs and glory, as the greatest empires could never boast. Far from being alarmed at every motion on the continent; far from being oppressed for the support of foreign schemes; we might enjoy the fecurest peace, and the most unenvied plenty. Far from courting, or purchasing the alliances of other nations, we might fee them fuing for ours. Far from being hated or defpifed, for involving ourfelves in all the little wrangles of the continent, we might be loved and refpected by all those who maintain the just ballance of Europe, and be formidable to those alone who should endeavor to break it.

HAVING made these few reflections on that part of queen ELIZABETH's policy which regarded Scotland, it is neceffary that we should fay fomething of that which regarded the nations on the continent. Now with thefe it is plain the took the feweft engagements fhe poffibly could, and fhunned as induftrioufly the occafions of mingling her interefts and counfels with theirs, as fhe fought the occafions of mingling both with those of Scotland.

WE believe, upon very good grounds, that periods of four or five years might be pointed out, in which this nation has been a party to more treaties than were made by queen ELI-ZABETH in the course of forty-five years ; and yet we prefume it will not be eafy to fhew, that this nation had more imminent dangers to avoid and more formidable powers to refift; or that fuch ends were attained with greater glory and fuccefs at these, or any other periods, than in the reign of queen ELI-ZABETH. Let us descend into some particulars.

WITH the northern crowns fhe kept in terms of amity, and good correspondence; and had some negotiations with that of

of Denmark, concerning the interefts of her fubjects in trade. The fame interefts drew her into negotiations with the Mufcovite, and fhe found means to conduct them to her great advantage.

THE fettlement made in Germany, a little before the abdication of CHARLES the fifth, continued. The protestants were quiet there, and defirous to remain fo. The general interest of religion did not call upon her to look that way; and it is evident, by the whole conduct of her reign, that she thought the particular interests of her kingdom very little concerned in those of the empire.

How attentive foever fhe might be to penetrate into the councils of the court of Rome, and to trace the intrigues of the Vatican from their fource; fhe bore no part whatever in the affairs of Italy.

IN fhort, as all the meafures fhe took in foreign affairs were confidered relatively to the fituation of England, fhe had nothing to do in the much greateft part of the bufinefs of the continent; and fhe was fo far from entering into engagements by treaty, that fhe was fcarce ever concerned in negotiations about it. In France, Spain, and the Low Countries fhe had more to do; but even there the part fhe took was ftrictly no more than the fecurity and welfare of her own kingdoms required; and fhe acted it in no other manner than was fuitable to the fituation of England.

THE state of Scotland, of Ireland, and for fome time of England itfelf, gave her just reason to apprehend that the French, or Spaniards, or both, might get footing there. Each of these had, at different times, pretensions of their own to her her crown. The caufe of MARY queen of Scotland afforded them, for a long time, both pretence and opportunity; and the united force of the Roman-catholic party was, at all times, ready to fupport their enterprifes. Spain was the greatest maritime power in Europe, and able to attempt the invafion of England, even when queen ELIZABETH had been above thirty years on the throne, and had raifed her navy from the low condition in which fhe found it. In a word, the whole coaft, from the ftreight of Gibraltar almost to Jutland, belonged to France and Spain. Such circumstances formed a conjuncture, wherein these two powers had advantages against her, which they could have had in no other; and if fhe was obliged to act towards them in a different manner from what she did towards the other powers of the continent, it was becaufe fhe ftood exposed to lofe, at least in part, with respect to them, the advantages of her fituation.

How fhe acted towards them, has been obferved already. She amufed them and eluded their defigns, by the moft artful feries of management. She fought no alliances against them with other nations; and tho' fhe did not fail to abet and fupport the infurrections of their fubjects, yet even with these the was cautious of entering into engagements by treaty. She did it with the Huguenots by a treaty figned in 1562, which the vidame of Chartres had negotiated. The fuccefs of the treaty, and the ungrateful behavior of the Huguenots to her, confirmed her in the principle of depending little on allies, and much on herfelf. She chofe rather to affift when and where the thought fit, and to affift gratis, than to be tied down to the confequences of constant obligations, for the notional advantage of reciprocal engagements.

VOL. I.

In the year 1577 fhe began to take fo intimate a concern in the affairs of the Low Countries, that the moft important counfels and refolutions of those states were communicated to her; and she lent them an hundred thousand pounds; yet it does not seem probable, that she entered so foon into a formal alliance with them, tho' such an alliance be mentioned by METEREN, as well as CAMBDEN, and inferted from the former in the collection of treaties.

IN the year 1585 the clouds gathered on every fide, and threatened queen ELIZABETH with that terrible florm, part of which fell upon her, and part of which fhe averted. She beheld PHILIP mafter of Portugal as well as Spain. She beheld the duke of Guife growing apace to be mafter of France. She faw thefe two princes clofely united by principles, which might continue in force long enough to complete her ruin. She faw the Low Countries almost quite reduced by the arms of Spain; and the protestants of France in the utmost danger of being fo by the league. Dangers from Ireland, and dangers from Scotland impended over her.

IN fuch a crifis, more terrible, as we apprehend, than any which has threatened this nation fince that time, what was the conduct of our heroic queen? Did fhe immediately prepare to oppofe thefe dangers, by making alliances on the continent? Did fhe purchafe acceffions to thefe alliances? Did fhe raife armies, and pay fubfidies abroad? Did fhe give guaranties to every prince and flate who afked them; and, in order to ward againft one danger, fow the feeds of many? By no means. She fent indeed fir THOMAS BODLEY, to the king of Denmark, as well as to the landgrave of Heffe, and other proteftant princes of the empire, "to procure a league for "de-

" defence of their religion," fays CAMEDEN. But this league does not appear, nor any other effect of these negotiations. " As the was very faving of her money, it is likely, fays RA-PIN, " that fhe did not employ the most proper means to " bring the princes of Germany into her interefts." She fecured herfelf by a great deal of management on the fide of Scotland. She affifted the king of Navarre, and the prince of Conde, with money and ships; and the fole treaty she made on the continent was that with the flates of the Low Countries, concluded the tenth of August 1585 at Nonefuch. Her chief dependence was upon her own ability and courage; upon the affection and zeal of her people. Neither failed her. Sure of being attacked, fhe began the attack. Whilft CAVENDISH pillaged the coafts of Chili and Peru, fhe fent DRAKE to the coafts of Spain, with orders to burn all the Spanish ships he should meet. Her orders were executed with the fpirit with which they were given. More than an hun-dred veffels, loaded with provision and ammunition, were burnt at Gibraltar. The Spanish admiral was infulted at the mouth of the Tagus, and the Spaniards were taken, or destroyed, even under his eyes; an infamy fo great, that the fuffering of it was fcarce in example before that time. The riches coming from the Indies to Spain, fell into the hands of the English. The projects of PHILIP were disappointed in the year 1587; and when the invasion was attempted in the year 1588, his army was blocked up in the ports of the Low Countries, and his invincible armada was beat, feattered and deftroyed.

WE have now gone through all we propose to fay at this time, concerning the conduct of queen ELIZABETH, both at home and abroad; concerning that conduct, which, by convincing her people of her goodness and her wisdom, procured K k k 2 from from them those large returns of gratitude, of duty, of affection and zeal, the fole foundations on which fhe refted her authority and her fecurity; and the fole foundations on which they can be refted, fuitably to the nature of our government. The limitations, neceffary to render monarchy confiftent with public liberty, must be many and great; for which reason it has been objected to them, that they took off from that weight of authority and reftrained that fulnefs of power, which are many times neceffary to be exerted, even for the good of the whole community. If this objection was well founded, it would be a fufficient anfwer, to fay that a few accidental inconveniencies, which may happen, and which may be recompenced too, in government, deserve not to be prevented, at the expence of leaving liberty perpetually exposed. But the reign of queen ELIZABETH proves, beyond contradiction, that a prince like her will enjoy, at the head of the freeft people on earth, all the authority, and all the power necessary to promote the joint fecurity, profperity and glory of prince and people. So that all the objections which can be raifed on this fide to the British constitution of government, will center here; that it has not provided for ftrengthening and enlarging the authority and power of a weak or a wicked prince.

A PRINCE who never feparates the interefts juft mentioned; and who purfues them wifely, will have abfolute power in the moft limited monarchy. A prince who feparates thefe interefts, turns government itfelf into faction; and the fpirit of liberty will rife againft him. An arbitrary government is fuited to any character. A free government requires a great, at leaft, a good one. In the former, all kinds and degrees of power are in the prince, or flow from him. In the latter, his powers are limited and confined. When he wants to encreafe, or extend them, he muft derive the faculty of doing fo from his his people; and from hence it follows, that as long as fuch a conflitution remains entire and uncorrupted, the profperity, nay the eafe, and even the fecurity of the government, will depend on the disposition of the people towards the prince; as the difposition of the people will always depend on the behavior of the prince towards the people. Queen ELIZABETH faw thefe truths in all their force. She was both willing and able to proportion her conduct to them. She never felt therefore any want of power. She was supported by the fpirit of liberty; and the overcame that of faction. Some of her fucceffors either did not fee thefe truths in all their force, or were unable to proportion their conduct to them. These princes therefore felt the limitations of our monarchy like shackles upon them. The spirit of liberty either opposed, or did not support them; and they nursed up a spirit of faction to the ruin of themfelves, of their families, and almost of the nation.

THE fcene we are now going to open will appear vaftly different from that which we just closed.---Instead of an uninterrupted, pleasing harmony of government, we shall meet with a perpetual, jarring diffonance; instead of fuccess and glory abroad, disappointment and contempt; instead of fatisfaction, prosperity and union at home, discontent, distrefs, and at last civil war will prefent themselves to us in all their horrors.

To confider this melancholy change, and to fhew from whence it proceeded, whether from the prince, or from the people, is our present business. That it was brought about and carried on by faction, must not be denied. The fole queftion will therefore be, which was the factious fide? Now to determine this, we need only enquire, which fide was for ufurping on the other; which was for preferving and which for altering the established constitution of government. On this point the queftion will turn; for in a country of liberty, in a limited monarchy, whatever fome perfons may think, or defire to have believed, it is certain that there may be faction for the crown, as well as against the crown. The reason is plain. There may be confpiracies against liberty, as well as against prerogative. Private interest may fcreen or defend a bad administration, as well as attack or undermine a good one. In fhort, confpiring against any one part of the conftitution, in favor of another, or perverting, to the fupport of national grievances, the very means, which were inftituted to redrefs redrefs them, are deftructive of the whole frame of fuch a government, and are the proper characteristics of faction.

On which fide faction, thus defined, is likely to be found the ofteneft, and to act the most effectually, we shall not flay to examine here. They, who have read the first of these letters, may remember what is there faid, to fhew the difference between the motives and the means, which a prince hath of ufurping on his people; and those which the people have of encroaching on their prince. We shall only observe, to our prefent purpose, that as he, who confines his notions of faction to oppositions made to the crown, reasons, in an absolute monarchy, in favor of the conftitution; fo he, who confines them thus, reasons, in a limited monarchy, against the conflitution; is weak enough to deceive himfelf, or wicked enough to attempt deceiving others; and, in either cafe, is. thus far a betrayer of public liberty .--- On fuch principles as these we faid, in our last paper, that government itself might be turned into faction; and that fome of queen ELIZABETH's fuccessors had nursed up a spirit of faction, to the ruin of themfelves, of their families, and almost of the nation .--- We prefume that this will appear, in the courfe of our enquiries, to be undeniably true; and that there will be as little room to doubt whether the factious conduct of the court, in the reigns of king JAMES and king CHARLES the first, gave a rife to all the struggles between them and their people, as there is room to deny that the deftruction of our conflictution in church and ftate, was the dreadful confequence of these ftruggles. The fpirit of liberty and the British constitution of government, whofe caufe we are pleading, and whofe caufe we are forry there fhould be fo much occasion to plead, will therefore, we hope, remain clear of all imputations.

WE with that this juffice could be done without opening wounds which are hardly yet intirely healed, and without arraigning the conduct of princes, whofe memories have been held in great veneration by many worthy perfons : but fince this cannot be; nay, fince the opening of thefe wounds may contribute to the more effectual healing of them; and fince arraigning the conduct of thefe princes hath been rendered the more neceffary by the accounts which have been given of it, and by the principles on which it hath been defended; we muft fpeak with the fame liberty of them, as we have ufed in fpeaking of thofe who reigned before them.

THE Ægyptians paid fo much refpect to their very limited monarchs, that when they meant to warn thefe princes againft particular vices, they commended them for oppofite virtues. We cannot perfuade ourfelves that this method of reforming, or inftructing, by panegyric, the ufual and moft deadly poffon of other princes, had a good effect on thofe of Ægypt. But however this might be, when thefe princes were dead, notwithftanding the refpect fhewn to them living *, they underwent the fame trial as the cuftom of the kingdom had eftablifhed for all private perfons, and funeral honors were equally denied to them, and to the meaneft and moft guilty of their fubjects, when their memories were condemned, on a folemn and ftrict examination of the conduct they had held in life.

THO' we propose to enquire with all this freedom; and tho' we are perfuaded that the refult of these enquiries will be a confirmation of what hath been advanced by us; yet are we very far from admitting many of the objections which have been made to the conduct of king JAMES and king CHARLES the firft. Much lefs do we approve those cruel infinuations against them, which are to be found in feveral invectives, not histories, dictated by a spirit of faction, not by the spirit of liberty. The spirit of liberty reflects on the errors of princes with forrow, not with triumph, and is unwilling to aggravate what it wiss had never happened.----In the temper which this spirit infpires therefore, we shall proceed. We shall dwell on no facts, but such as we think uncontroverted; and shall make no reflections, nor draw any consequences from them, but such as arise naturally and without the least force.---The truth would not be so evident, as we prefume it is in this cafe, if any thing more was necessary to the illustration of it.

AMONGST the many advantages which king JAMES had, on his acceffion to the throne of England, we might very juftly reckon the recent example of his predeceffor. Her penetration discovered the confequences of that great change in the ballance of property, of which we have fpoken in letters XI and XII; and the accommodated at once the whole fystem of her government to it, as we have there observed .--- Whatever doubts fhe might have entertained, concerning the fuccefs of her own measures, before the had experienced the happy effects of them, king JAMES could reafonably entertain none. Experience, as well as reason, pointed out to him the sole principle, on which he could eftablish his government with advantage, or even with fafety; and queen ELIZABETH's reign had every year afforded him fresh proofs that this principle of government, which is easy in the purfuit, is effectual in the end to all the purpofes which a good man and a just prince can defire to obtain. But king JAMES paid as little regard to her example, as he did to her memory. In the last respect, he was indecent; in the other, unwife. He boafted moft ridiculoufly of an influence which he never had over her councils. Happy would L11 VOL. I.

would it have been for him, for his family, and for this whole nation, if her example had really had a due influence over his conduct; or, at least, if his example had obtained less influence over the conduct of his fuccefior .--- Fraught with learning, not with knowledge; ignorant of the true principles of government; more a ftranger to our confliction by his no-tions and his habits of thinking, than to our country by his birth ; obflinate, tho' not fleady ; misled by felf-opinion, and confirmed in error by fuperlative pedantry, king JAMES the first feemed to expect the love, and to demand the obedience of his fubjects, purely becaufe the crown had dropt on his head. Whereas queen ELIZABETH feemed, both by her declarations and her actions, to think herfelf intitled to the first, and fecure of the laft, for no other reason than this; because fhe wore the crown to the greatest advantage of her people. Her good fense taught her what he had not found in his books; that the ties between prince and people are not the fame with those between particular perfons in private life. These perfons converse and live familiarly together. Natural fympathies therefore, more eafily to be felt than defcribed, may unite them without the motives of gratitude, or expectation. Those common good offices, which the heart alone suggests, are often fufficient to maintain fuch unions; and a man, who is neither a faint, nor a hero, may hope to find and keep a friend. But public, or political, or ftate-friendship, by which we mean an intimate and affectionate union between the governors and the governed, cannot be contracted without gratitude, or expectation, nor maintained without both. If it could; if fubjects were attached to their prince by a kind of instinct, as hard to be accounted for, and yet as prevalent as the fympathies we have mentioned; the affertors of the divine right of princes, and of the universal obedience due to them, would have had long ago a more plaufible argument than they have

have yet produced, in favor of their doctrines. They would have been able to ftop the mouths of all gainfayers; even of him who required a miracle to become their convert; and who refolved never to believe that flavery was of divine inftitution, till he beheld "fubjects born with bunches on their backs, "like camels, and kings with combs on their heads like cocks;" from which marks it might be collected that the former were defigned to labor and to fuffer, and the latter to ftrut and to crow. But till fome fuch miracle is wrought, or the inftinet fupposed above is born with men, we think it will remain true that the union we fpeak of, between prince and people, neither can, nor ought to fubfift on any other terms, than those of good government on one part, and of gratitude and expectation on the other .--- This union may be, and hath been, maintained by abfolute princes with their people; becaufe it is not impoffible that an abfolute prince fhould be a wife and good man; and becaufe fome fuch there have been. But here lies a difference. The abfolute monarch may exert the whole power of the state. He may govern eafily, fafely, and with all other advantages, tho' he neglects to cultivate this union ; or, which is worfe, tho' he breaks it. But the cafe of a limited monarch is not the fame, for the reafons which we touched upon, at the end of our last letter. It is therefore the immediate, the perfonal, the higheft intereft of fuch a prince, as it is the duty of every prince, to contract this union, and to maintain it inviolate. The wifdom of our conftitution hath made it fo; and, in making it fo, hath imitated that divine wifdom, which appears in the conftitution of the moral world. In this, it may be eafily proved from a confideration of the circumstances in which we stand as individuals, that the general good of fociety is the particular intereft of every member. Our Creator defigned therefore that we should promote this general good. It is by confequence our duty to do fo; and L 1 2 every every man, who believes a wife, all-directing mind, and who knows that proportioning of means to ends is effential to wifdom, muft fubfcribe to this opinion.----And yet, determined by falfe appearances of good, or attracted by the force of immediate objects, men may, and they frequently do, imagine that they purfue their particular and feparate intereft, whilft they neglect, or act against, the general and common intereft of fociety.

IN like manner, king JAMES the firft, and those princes who have trod in his steps, imagined no doubt that they purfued a particular, separate interest of their own, whilst they neglected an union with their people, and even made such an union impracticable, by transgressing, in pretensions and in fact, the bounds which our constitution preferibed to them. But the mistake is equal in both cases; for in both cases, interest and duty remain indivisibly united, however they may be separated in opinion; and he who fins against one, fins most certainly against the other; tho' the natural consequences of his actions do not appear immediately, nor on every occasion, to follow.

THESE confequences followed in a fignal and terrible manner upon the occafions which we have mentioned, and into the particulars of which we fhall defcend fome other time. Thefe examples therefore are complete. The caufes and the effects come together under one view; and if we carry our obfervations forward to later times, we fhall fee caufes of the fame kind laid again, and producing effects of the fame nature; effects always proportionable to them; fometimes jealoufy, difcontent, tumult; fometimes open refiftance, and depolition of the prince; for tho', in all thefe cafes, the people have fuffered, as well as the prince; yet in fome, the prince alone alone hath been undone; and thus, by an equal diffribution of juffice, the principal fhare of the common calamity hath fallen on him, without whom no part of it could have happened.

THO' thefe general reflections, which we have premifed, may appear long to fome of our readers, and may feem too nearly allied to reflections already made; yet we hope for indulgence, on account of the importance of the matter. It muft furely be of ufe to explain very clearly, and very fully, from whence the weaknefs of our government, at fome times, and the diforders and revolutions of it at others, have proceeded fince that æra, when our liberties became better fecured, and our conflitution capable of greater improvements, by a new fettlement of the ballance of property and power. No point hath been more miftaken. None hath been more artfully mifreprefented.

WE have observed already of how great advantage the example of queen ELIZABETH might have been to king JAMES the first. It might have taught him to struggle through the most intricate difficulties. But he had none such to encounter, till he created them by his own management.----On the contrary, his accession to the throne of England was accompanied with all the favorable circumstances of eafe and fecurity, which were neceffary to form a conjuncture proper for him; fo that with abilities, much inferior to those of his predeceffor, he might have reigned as glorioufly abroad, and as happily at home .---- Many of the difficulties and dangers which furrounded her, were perfonal to her. They arole from her birth; from her title; and from that which MARY queen of Scotland pretended. They therefore ceafed with her. Many others fhe had conquered by a wife and fleady administration. Many had been worn out by length of time; and many had been fo changed by the course of events, that king JAMes was fafe, where the was most in danger; and strong, where the was weakeft .--- His title was not contefted ; nor any opposition, either open or fecret, given to his fucceffion. They who had founded to high the right of his mother, could not refuse to acknowledge the fame right in him; and the reft of the nation fubmitted to it; for how little regard foever many of them might pay to this right in their hearts, or how great fufpicion foever of his future conduct might be justly infused into them by his paft behavior, the people would have a king, and there was no other prince, in whom the protestant interest could unite at that time .--- That riddle of a plot, in which fir WALTER 3

WALTER RALEIGH was involved, does not deferve to be mentioned, as an exception to the national unanimity we fpeak of. --- True it is, that, in other respects, the nation was far from being united, either by a conformity of opinion, or by an acquiescence of those who differed from the establishment .--- It was, no doubt, a fevere misfortune, and fuch it continues to this very hour, that the great and glorious work of the reformation, being carried on at different times, and in different places, was carried on likewife without a general concert. The feveral churches reformed themfelves, according to the different circumftances they were in, and according to the different characters of the few, who led the many in each of them. The feparation of them all from the church of Rome was intire; but, in fome, it was thought proper to reform; in others, to alter the whole model; in fome, many things were retained, which had been in practice before the reformation; in others, a total opposition to every inftance of conformity with the church of Rome feemed to be the fole ftandard of chriftian purity .--- This variety of opinions and eftablifhments amongst the reformed was a great evil in itself; but this evil was aggravated by a circumstance of the most fatal confequence. The reformers, and especially those who came lateft, as our excellent Mr. HOOKER * observes, by enforcing too peremptorily their particular modes of reformation, brought the people in many cafes to receive and refpect, as divine laws, even those orders and that discipline, which expediency or other political motives had fuggefted. Now, the natural tendency of this perfuafion was not only to render all comprehenfion or reconciliation amongst the reformed churches impracticable; but to make the divisions, in any particular church, incurable .---- Thus, when queen ELIZABETH completed that establishment of a church, which EDWARD the fixth had begun, many diffented from it; and the fcruples of private confcience were pleaded against fubmission to the public authority of the state .--- If regard had been paid to all who petitioned the queen, or admonished the parliament, in the heat of these times, it seems probable that no establishment at all could have been made; and if none had been made, an ecclefiaftical anarchy must have enfued .--- How far the number of separatists might have been lessend by more compliances with the learned and moderate amongst them, for fuch there certainly were, we shall neither presume to determine, nor go about to enquire. It is fufficient for our present purpofe to obferve, that altho' thefe feeds of difturbance had been fowed before the accession of king JAMES; yet no difturbance had happened, nor was any likely to happen at that time. The meafures which had been purfued, and the temper which had been observed in queen ELIZABETH's reign, tended to diminish the religious opposition by a slow, a gentle, and for that very reason an effectual progression; and, in the mean while, to prevent fuch confequences of it as might diforder or weaken the government .--- By the laws which were made, the feveral diffenting fects were difcouraged and kept in awe; but by the execution of thefe laws, they were not exafperated. They were punished, not provoked. They felt the weight of the government, as often as they attempted to disturb it, but they never felt the oppression of party; and when they were treated like factions, they had not the pretence to complain that they were treated fo by a faction .--- Upon this foot there was even room to hope, that when the first fire of these men's zeal was spent, reasonable terms of union with the established church might be accepted by fuch of them as were not intoxicated with fanaticifm. Such as these were friends to order, tho' they disputed about it,

it, and could have the lefs pretence to reject with obftinacy that which had been fettled by queen ELIZABETH, becaufe they knew that their own discipline had been established where it prevailed, as the church of England had been by the fupreme authority; that it had been made a law of the country; that the people had been bound by oath to the maintenance of it; and that CALVIN himfelf had been a most rigorous exactor of conformity to it .--- If fuch as these had been once incorporated with the eftablished church, the remaining fectaries would have been of little moment, either for numbers, or reputation; and the very means, which were proper to gain these, were likewise the most effectual to hinder the increase of them, and of the other sectaries in the mean time .---Upon the whole matter, we think it very plain that king JAMES the first, besides the advantage of coming to the crown, after all the difficulties and dangers of completing the reformation, and eftablishing a new church were over, had an easy and fecure opportunity of preventing any bad confequences, which might be apprehended from the divisions of his protestant fubjects; and that the improvement of this opportunity, confifted in giving neither alarm to the well-affected, nor pretence to the factious.

THE defigns of the Roman-catholic party, against the confitution in church and state, were carried on with as much rage, but not with as much strength as ever. The hydraheads, which sprouted continually out of that body in the former reign, had been lopt so often, that they appeared more rarely; and if the venom of that principle which produced them, was not abated; yet many of the springs, which fed and nouriss it, were exhausted. The GUISES, MARY queen of Scotland, PHILIP the second, were dead. The reformation was established; not only in outward form, but in the hearts Vol. I. M m m of of men. It was grown up to be a part, and a favorite part, of the constitution. The spirit of liberty had blended our civil and religious rights together, and was become equally jealous of both. Let us add, for we may add it with great juffice, that the church of England was, by the fobriety, wifdom and fanctity of her inftitution, established on a rock; that this rock was defended by the greateft number of excellent men, which any chriftian church could boaft of : and from all this let us conclude, that as the was able to refift the attacks of those fects, which private conceit, mistaken zeal, fome enthufiafm, and perhaps fome faction had nurfed up in her own bofom; fo fhe was better able than any other protestant church to defend herfelf, and the ftate too, against the fallacies, the feductions, and the violence of Rome. The policy of this court faw it, and neglected nothing to prevent the confequences. Seminaries had been erected at Doway and other places abroad, for the education of English youth in popery. GRE-GORY the thirteenth had given the direction of that, which was erected at Rome, to the Jefuits; and upon that occasion these incendiaries crept into England. If we may believe fome accounts, they mingled themfelves amongft the clergy of the church of England and the puritan ministers. That they took all methods to foment our divisions is probable; and that they were not men, who would flick at any, may be certainly collected from that account of their conduct here, and of the doctrines they taught, which is contained in the complaints exhibited against them by the rest of the * popish clergy.

THUS was the fpirit of the church and court of Rome kept up here, even at the time of the acceflion of king JAMES; a spirit, which might ferve to bring about an affafination, or any barbarous and defperate stroke, like that of the gunpowder-treason, which a few enthusiasts were capable of executing; but not to fubvert the reformation, and introduce popery anew. The efforts of this party now were like the laft convultions of a ftrong body, mortally wounded; frightful to behold ; fufficient to hurt others ; but tokens of death, not fymptoms of recovery .--- King JAMES had it therefore in his power to keep down with eafe a party, which queen ELIZA-BETH had fubdued with pain; and whatever impression the bloody defigns they had often formed, and fometimes brought to effect, might make on his mind; certain it was, and the event made that certainty undeniable, that no degree of favor to them, except the utmost, could effectually fecure him against their attempts; and that the least degree of favor shewn, or encouragement given them, would be productive of the greatest national mischief.

WE have dwelt longer on these points of religious divifions, because we think a clear and just notion of them absolutely necessary to fix a right opinion, concerning one of the principal causes, which were laid in this reign, of all the national calamities that followed.---We shall mention the other advantages which attended king James the first, as briefly as we can; not because they were small, for, on the contrary, they were exceedingly great; but because they are more notorious, and have no need of being for much developed, in order to be made fensible.

THUS, for infrance, the different condition in which he found the navy, the commerce, and the wealth of the nation, as well as the revenues of the crown, from that in which queen ELIZABOTH had found them all at her acceffion, is known in general by every one who hath dipt into hiftory. Without M m m 2 enter-entering into more particulars therefore than we have done already, we may venture to conclude that he reaped the benefit of her oeconomy, and was a rich, as well as a powerful king. We know very well that when the feffion of parlia-ment was opened by commission in 1610, by the earls of SUFFOLK and SALISBURY, one of the reasons urged, for de-manding money of the commons, was grounded on a debt of queen ELIZABETH, which was faid to have abforbed three hundred fifty thousand pounds, due on the last subfidies granted to her. If this fact was true, all that refulted from it is; first, that queen ELIZABETH left a mortgage on the lands of the crown, and money enough to discharge it; secondly, that king JAMES parted with his money to recover his lands; and we shall not oppose any person, who will charitably believe that this prince would have paid the debts of his predeceffor, tho' they had not been thus fecured, out of the money she left in her coffers; because to have done otherwise, would have been a manifest violation of all the rules of religion, honor and common morality. But we much doubt whether even this averment of the lords, who opened the feffion, will have any great weight, when it shall be confidered that their whole discourse was too ministerial to be fincere; and that fome of the reafons, by which they accounted for the king's. want of money, fuch, for inftance, as the charge of protecting his wife and children from being robbed on the road to London, were really burlefque.

THE advantages which this prince had in the fituation of foreign affairs, both at his acceffion to the throne, and during the greateft part of his reign, were remarkably great; and we doubt whether it is possible to find more than one conjuncture equally favorable fince that time.---PHILIP the third was on the throne of Spain; a prince of fmall capacity, and lefs application;

cation; governed by his favorite, and his favorite detefted by the people. Before the end of king JAMES's reign he died; and PHILIP the fourth, his fon, fucceeded; a youth of fixteen years old, and governed as abfolutely by OLIVAREZ, as his father had been by the duke of LERMA. The declenfion of the Spanish monarchy hastened on apace, under these princes. It is faid that PHILIP the third refused to support the Romancatholic party, in the beginning of the reign of king JAMES; which is the more probable, on account of the early and precipitate steps made by this prince, towards a peace with Spain. The defeat of don JOHN d'AQUILA in Ireland, and the intire reduction of Tyrone, which happened a little before the death. of queen ELIZABETH, discouraged the Spaniards from making any more attempts of that kind. They turned their eyes from thefe islands to the continent; to the Low Countries and to Germany, where they continued, during the courfe of many years, to confume their remains of ftrength, in abetting the ambitious projects of that branch of the house of Austria.

As king JAMES had nothing to apprehend from the enmity of Spain, fo he was fecure of the friendfhip of France. HENRY the fourth was now eftablifhed on that throne. He was in peace indeed with Spain, but intended not to be fo long. We are very far from believing that this prince could ferioufly entertain fo chimerical a project as that of making an intire new fettlement of Europe, by dividing it into fifteen ftates, which PAREFIXE and other authors have related, upon the faith of the compilers of SULLY's memoirs; but, without doubt, he had great views of checking the ambition, and reducing the power of the houfe of Auftria. It was therefore his intereft to live well with the king of Great-Britain ; and accordingly he fent the marquis of ROSNY, afterwards duke of SULLY, to renew the treaties with king JAMES, as foon almoft as this prince was feated feated on the throne of England. When HENRY the fourth was ftabbed by RAVAILLAC, a minority followed in France, and the counfels of that court were, for many years, chiefly employed about their own affairs : fo that nothing could hap... pen on that fide, even after this great change, to give the leaft diffurbance to king JAMES.

THE states of the Low Countries were no longer in the fame distressed condition. Their commonwealth had taken form ; their naval force was increasing; and their commerce extending itself every day. Oftend kept the Spanish forces at bay for more than three years; and when SPINOLA made himfelf master of that heap of ruins, the Dutch thought themselves fufficiently recompenfed by the acquifition which they had made, in the mean time, of Sluyce and other important places. The truce of eight months between Spain and the States was figned in 1607. It was prolonged afterwards; and in the year 1609, the truce of twelve years was concluded at Antwerp; by which the king of Spain was forced to acknowledge the liberty and independency of the United Provinces. Thus was that commonwealth established, to be a great and lasting acceffion of ftrength to the protestant interest; and king JAMES might have reaped the benefit of an useful alliance, where queen ELIZAB'TH had no other advantage than that of defending the opprefied, and diverting the forces of a common enemy.

THE affairs of the North, indeed, were in great confusion about the fame time. The crown of Sweden belonged to SI-GISMUND in courfe of defcent; but SIGISMUND was a papift, and king of Poland. For both thefe reasons, he had been excluded, and his uncle CHARLES preferred to the throne by the ftates of Sweden; who provided, by the act of fettlement, not only that their kings should be of the religion of the country, but but that none of the princes of the royal family fhould accept another crown, nor any foreign dominions. Their experience, it feems, had fhewn them the neceflity of fuch limitations. This gave occafion to those long and cruel wars, which followed between Sweden and Poland. Others fucceeded between Sweden and Denmark; but the fcene of them all was fo remote, and the interests of this country fo abfolutely unconcerned in the events of them, that he, who should have advised king JAMES to take any part in them, would have paffed, in those days, for a very bad politician.

THE indolent RODOLPHUS flept on the throne of the empire till the year 1614. His brother MATTHIAS fucceeded him; and their coufin FERDINAND fucceeded MATTHIAS. During the reign of RODOLPHUS, there were troubles in Hungary, in. Transilvania, in Bohemia, and in feveral parts of the empire. Most of them were caused, all of them were fomented, by religious divisions. During the reign of MATTHIAS, these troubles increafed. They grew up to maturity, as the acceffion of FERDINAND to the empire approached. The Bohemians, long oppressed, and long provoked, took arms at last in 1618. Many caufes confpired to render all accommodation impracticable. Amongst the principal were the defigns, which all the branches of the house of Austria had laid and begun to execute against liberty and the protestant religion in Germany; the character of FERDINAND, violent, cruel, a bigot, tho'artful; and, to fpeak impartially, the ambition of FREDERIC, elector Palatine. If this ambition had been the fole motive to engage king JAMES in these quarrels, we must think that he could not have answered to his own people the engaging in them, as popular as the Palatine, his wife, and his caufe were in England. But these quarrels were of another importance. FREDERIC lost not only the crown of Bohemia, but his own patrimony. The protestant religion, and the liberty of Germany were well nigh facrificed to the bigotry and ambition of the emperor; fo that the intereft of this nation, as well as the king's family intereft, was very much concerned to prevent these confequences; and yet, even upon this foot, we must likewise think that it would not have been long popular in those days, when the memory of queen ELIZABETH's policy was fresh in the minds of men, to have maintained great armies on the continent, and to have fed with fubfidies fo many hungry princes, who had, at leaft in the beginning, nothing lefs at heart than the common intereft.

THIS difficult and dangerous fituation of affairs on the continent, in which we allow that king JAMES ought to have taken fome part, may be thought, perhaps, to form an exception to what hath been faid, concerning those circumstances of advantage, of eafe, and fecurity, which accompanied the reign of this prince; but there will be room to think fo no longer, when it shall be confidered that king JAMES had time and means to prepare for this critical conjuncture. The diffress in foreign affairs began with queen ELIZABETH's reign; and she was in danger abroad, before she was settled on her throne at home; but he had reigned near eighteen years before any thing happened on the continent, which could give him a just occafion of acting vigoroufly in that fcene. Befides, when this occafion did happen, he had it in his power to have acted with great glory to himfelf, and effectually for the fervice of those whom it was his interest to support, without taking any other part than that which becomes a king of England, in oppofition to that which becomes a prince on the continent, and agreeably to the principles of his predecessor's conduct. This will appear evidently true, when we come to confider the part he did take; and we shall infift upon it the rather, because we 5

we obferve with how much affectation the cafe we are now fpeaking of, hath been quoted as parallel to the prefent fituation of affairs; and how impertinently it hath been taken for granted, that king JAMES the firft was condemned in his own time, and hath been condemned fince, for not doing what thefe time-ferving politicians recommend; that is, for entangling himfelf in the affairs of the empire, as if he had been a prince of the empire; and for not acting on every appearance of danger, or even of inconveniency to any little flate of Germany, in fuch a manner as is agreeable neither to the intereft, nor fituation of our ifland.

WHAT hath been faid may be fufficient to fhew how few the difficulties were, compared with the advantages, which king JAMES had to encounter both at home and abroad; and how fortunate a conjuncture was prepared for him by the wifdom of his predeceffor, and by an happy combination of circumftances.---What use he made of these advantages, what conduct he held, and what confequences it had, must be the fubject of another difcourse.

LETTER XIX.

BY what hath been faid, in former letters, we think it appears, that from the time our conflitution fettled on the foundation on which it remains still, there hath been not only no poffibility of governing this nation with ftrength and dignity, without the concurrence of the people in their reprefentative body, nor with eafe and fafety without their concurtence in their collective body; but that this concurrence hath depended, and does and must always depend, on the union of interest and affection between the king and his subjects.

We beg leave to repeat that queen ELIZABETH faw this to be a fure, and the only fure principle, on which the could establish her government under such a constitution; that she very wifely took the government on the terms of the conftitution, and the conftitution as fhe found it; that instead of ftruggling through trouble and danger to bend the conftitution to any particular notions or views of her own, the accommodated her notions, her views, and her whole character to it.---Let us observe, by the way, that this is no more than what every prince ought to do; and what every free people will expect and exact too, if need be, that he fhould do. He is made for their fakes, not they for his. He is raifed to maintain, not to alter the conftitution.

Now king JAMES begun and continued, through the whole course of his reign, to govern without any regard to this principle; nay, in abfolute defiance of it. He chofe other expedients of government, and trufted to fo many broken reeds. With-

Without any talents to procure the effeem, he awakened the jealoufy and never courted the good-will of his people; but, instead of it, endeavored to instil into their minds what was rooted in his own, a very good opinion of himfelf, and a very mean opinion of them. He endeavored to perfuade men, who felt that the ballance of property was on their fide, and that they held a great share of the supreme power in their hands, that tho' they had this property, yet they had no right, or a very precarious one, to this power. He meant, by the force of new-fangled opinions, to attach the nation to him, as queen ELIZABETH had done by the ties of affection and confidence; or he meant to govern without the concurrence of the nation; or he meant nothing. The first was chimerical, the second was wicked, and the third was flupid .--- ELIZABETH had been jealous of her prerogative, but moderate in the exercife of it. Wifer JAMES imagined that the higher he carried it, and the more rigoroufly he exerted it, the more ftrongly he fhould be feated in his throne. He miftook the weight for the ftrength of a fcepter; and did not confider that it is never fo likely to flip, or to be wrenched out of a prince's hands, as when it is heaviest. He never reflected that prerogative is of the nature of a fpring, which by much straining will certainly relax and often break; that in one cafe it becomes of little, and in the other of no use at all.

As abfurd as the notions and principles of government were, by which king JAMES hoped to eftablifh his authority, he found numbers to adopt them; for numbers are at all times liable to be deceived, ready to be tempted, and prone to be corrupted.----New fyftems of law and policy were not only received, but propagated. Some men were heated by oppofition. Others were educated in prejudice. The plaineft rights of the people were called in queftion. The leaft juftifiable

pretenfions of the crown were established as true axioms of government, and certain principles of the English constitution. What father PAUL observes to have happened in the church, happened here in the ftate. Our court, like that of Rome, by affirming and denying boldly, and by infifting peremptorily, brought many things to be received as certain, which had been never proved, and many others to be looked on as problematical, which had been often demonstrated. Thus were those divisions created, which could alone render the others fatal. Difputes about the use of the surplice, or the cross in baptifm, would not have unfheathed all the fwords in the nation. Puritanifm neither did, nor could make fuch deadly wounds; but when they were once made, puritanism festered in the fore, and rendered them mortal. King JAMES conjured up, by using tricks of government, that ftorm in which his fucceffor perished. His fucceffor, for we will finish the sketch we have begun, a religious and a just prince, came a partyman to the throne. His prejudices, confirmed by habit, fortified by the flattery of his courtiers, and provoked by the opposition which his father and he met with, carried him to continue an invation on the people's rights, whilft he imagined himfelf only concerned in the defence of his own. The faction of the court tainted the nation, and gave life and ftrength, if it did not give being, to the factions in the state. If the spirit of liberty could have prevailed in time against the first, there had been no danger from the others. But the long and obstinate refistance of the first gave time and opportunity, and even affistance to the others to extinguish this spirit. Cavaliers and Roundheads divided the nation, like Yorkifts and Lancaftrians. No other option was left at laft. To reconcile these disputes by treaty became impracticable, when neither fide would truft the other. To terminate them by the fword, was to fight, not for preferving the conftitution, but for the manner manner of deftroying it. The conftitution might have been deftroyed, under pretence of prerogative. It was deftroyed under pretence of liberty. We might have fallen under abfolute monarchy. We fell into abfolute anarchy. The fum of all is this. We were deftroyed by faction; but faction prevailed at court near forty years before it prevailed amongft the people. It was the original principle on one fide. It was an accident on the other. Churchmen and royalifts attacked the conftitution. Puritans and commonwealths-men, and, above all, a motely race of precife knaves and enthufiaftic madmen ruined it. But the laft could never have happened, if the firft had not; and whoever will difpaffionately trace the caufes of that deteftable civil war, will find them laid in the conduct of king JAMES the firft, as early as his acceffion to the throne of England.

HAVING given this general idea of the two reigns which followed that of queen ELIZABETH, it is time to examine whether this idea of them can be fupported by a feries of uncontroverted facts.---Let us defcend into fome particulars.

"A PRINCE, that is invited, or comes newly to a kingdom," fays WILSON, "muft have his chariot wheels fmooth fhod;" and furely if ever prince had motives and an opportunity to render himfelf popular, king JAMES had both. ESSEX, SOUTH-AMPTON and others, even CECIL, a principal minifter of the late queen, had held a correspondence with him, for their own private interest; but the millions who submitted to his acceffion, submitted to it upon trust, and were determined by the nature of the conjuncture, not by any knowledge of the perfons who composed this new royal family. It was not therefore enough for them to be placed in and about the throne. Their true interest required that the hearts of the people should be gained to them; and that popularity should fupply that spirit in their favor, which seldom fails to operate in favor of those princes, who are born and bred amongst the people they are to govern. The opportunity of doing this lay fairly before king JAMES. He was received with transports of joy, and all ranks of men made their court to him .--- If he looked on this national behavior, for fo it was, to be the effect of a defire in the people to endear themfelves to him, and to unite clofely with him; this fhould have fuggefted to his mind the eafe with which he might acquire popularity, by improving the disposition, and captivate the good-will of a people, fo defirous to be pleafed with their king. If he looked on this national behavior as the effect of levity, inconstancy and love of change, it should have taught him to apprehend how foon this honey-moon would pass away; how foon the stream of popular favor might turn against him; and how foon they, who feemed to have forgot queen ELIZABETH, might return to regret her .--- But that which a Scotfman foretold, happened. This behavior of the English spoiled a good king; or made a bad king worfe. It was natural for a vain man to believe what his flatterers told him, and what he, his own greateft flatterer, told himfelf; that these applauses and transports of the people were due to his eminent merit, and were an homage paid for the honor he did them in accepting their crown. ---He took therefore much state. He did not indeed make his journey, as HENRY the feventh made his entry into London, in a clofe chariot; but he forbid by proclamation the concourse of the people to him *. "He dispersed them with " frowns, that we may not fay with curfes." --- Such different turns of thought can vanity infpire. Some will be respected, like eastern monarchs, unseen within the shrine of their court. Others grow fond of public triumphs; delight in noify accla-

mations; and are pleafed to drive, like Indian pagods, over a proftrate crowd.

As much as king JAMES neglected to gain the public, even at the cheap price of affability, he funk into low familiarity with his favorites, and was profuse of riches and honors to particular men. He bestowed, at first on a few, and afterwards on one man, that affection which he had promifed the whole nation, in fome of the plaufible, common-place difcourfes which he held at certain times. There is no need of mentioning the particular inftances of a profusion he acknowledged himfelf. The eftates he gave to his courtiers impoverished the crown; and, as it always happens, the people were forced to pay for those very grants, at which they murmured. Honors he bestowed in so lavish a manner, and with fo little diftinction, that they ceafed, in fome fenfe, to be honors. To know the British nobility, it was become almost neceffary to have nomenclators, like those who attended the candidates at Rome, to tell them the names of the citizens. The jeft went fo far, that an advertisement of * " an art to " help weak memories to a competent knowledge of the names " of the nobility," was pasted up at Paul's.

THUS king JAMES began, and thus he continued his reign. That experience, which he faid, in his first speech to his parliament, would teach him not to be so easily and lightly moved in granting, taught him nothing. What a contrast does this conduct make with the affability of queen ELIZA-BETH; with the æconomy and referve she used, in disposing of her treasure, and in conferring honors?---But king JAMES stood in need of helps, to the want of which she was superior.

"A good government, fays one of our writers, makes a good "people." When a prince hath turned the fpirit of a nation in his favor, he need not be folicitous about gaining particular men; but when he hath turned this fpirit againft him, he muft employ all arts, even the loweft, to detach particular men from the body of the people, and to make them act by motives of private intereft againft the public fenfe. This is faction; and therefore whenever a court is induftrious to feduce, to inveigle, to corrupt particular men, we may fecurely conclude, without waiting for any other fign, that fuch an adminiftration ftands on a factious, not on a national bottom.----But to return to king JAMES.

WHILST he neglected the affection and fought the reverence of the public, he loft one, and was disappointed of the other. His private and his public character both fell into contempt. Learning was the part upon which he valued himfelf. This he affected more than became a king, and broached, on every occafion, in fuch a manner as would have mifbecome a fchoolmaster. His pedantry was too much even for the age in which he lived. It would be tedious to quote the part he took in the conference at Hampton Court; and in the theological wrangles between the Gomarifts and Arminians; or to go about to prove, by fome inftances, what appeared in all his words and actions; what is univerfally allowed; and what the unkingly volume he left behind him teftifies .--- Let us only observe, that the ridicule which arose from hence, and which fixed on him, was just; because the merit of a chief governor is wifely to fuper-intend the whole, and not to fhine in any inferior class; because different and, in some cases perhaps, opposite talents, both natural and acquired, are neceffary to move, and to regulate the movements of the machine of government; in short, because as a good adjutant may make a very

a very bad general; fo a great reader, and writer too, may be a very ignorant king.

THERE were many other circumstances, which concurred to leffen this prince in the eyes of his fubjects and of all mankind; as we shall have occasion to observe frequently in the courfe of these remarks .--- In the mean time, we shall observe here, that the ftate he affected, and the pompous titles he was fond of, ferved to render his pufilanimity, which, with his vanity, made up the main of his character, more conspicuous, and his perfon by confequence more contemptible .--- The hostilities between the English and Spaniards continued, when queen ELIZABETH died. This great queen, not content to have done herfelf and her fubjects justice, on many fignal occafions, put it likewife into their power to do themfelves jufice, by granting letters of reprisal on the subjects of Spain. King JAMES was fo fond of peace, that is, fo afraid of war, that without flaying to be folicited on this head, or to be complimented on his acceffion to the throne by the king of Spain, he revoked these letters in a few weeks after he came into England. He difarmed his fubjects, before he had provided for their better fecurity. He ftopt them in the courfe of doing themselves justice, before he was fure of obtaining reparation for their past loss. The impressions which fuch a proceeding must make on the minds of a trading people, are easily felt. He, who had revoked thefe letters in fuch a manner, was not likely to grant them on any other occafion. What protection therefore, and much lefs what encouragement to tradé could be expected from a prince, who began his reign by facrificing this, the most valuable interest of his people, to a foreign and hoftile nation; to the mean arts of false policy, and even to his fears ?--- Again ; one of the first embassies which king JAMES fent abroad, was that of the earl of HERT-000' VOL. I. FORD

FORD to Bruffels. A Dutch man of war meeting the ship which carried the ambaffador, refused to ftrike *; and having offered this affront to the united croffes, which had never been offered to that of St. GEORGE, went off with impunity. It is faid that the ambaffador hindered the captain from afferting the honor of the British flag. But two things are certain; one, that queen ELIZABETH would have feverely punished her officer, and have exacted ample reparation from the States General; the other, that king JAMES did neither. This commonwealth had been raifed by queen ELIZABETH, and was still in want of the fupport of England. The fovereignty of her ftate had not been yet acknowledged by any of the powers of Europe. How much the pacific temper of king JAMES was capable of bearing had not yet become fo apparent, as he made it in the course of his reign. From all which it is easy to collect, that if he had demanded fatisfaction, he must and * N. B. This fact ftands in hiftory, as it is here related; but having looked into fir WILLIAM MONSON'S naval tracks, we find it differently told. He fays nothing of striking, or not striking the flag; but confesses that an affront was offered by two Dutch men of war. He adds, that he fent for the captains on board his fhip; that he threatened to right himfelf upon them; but that he difmiffed them at the intreaty of my lord HERTFORD, on their excufing themfelves, and promifing to punish the offenders. How feverely these offenders were punished may be collected from hence. " One of these captains," fays fir WILLIAM MONSON, " was he, " who fince that time committed a foul murder upon his majefty's fubjects in " Ireland, that were under protection."-If we had no other proofs of the indignities offered to our nation by the Dutch, from the time of the acceffion of king JAMES the first, than the memorials of this gentleman, they would be fufficient. He complains of these indignities very much, and mentions several. In this very tract he affirms that the Hollanders took and burnt our ships, and murdered our men for trading to the ports of Flanders, whilft they fuffered their own country-men, even in our fight, to trade thither. The truth is, that our nation was infulted with impunity, during this pacific reign, not only in Europe, but in every other part of the world; not only by the Dutch, but by other nations; and that our government fell from the higheft efteem into the loweft contempt. If therefore the inftance we have quoted fhould be disputed, on the representation of this fact by fir WILLIAM MONSON, an hundred others, and feveral of them more flagrant, might be foon produced.

But the good prince was afraid, where no fear was, and bore difhonorably what he might have refented fafely; nay, what he ought to have refented in any circumftances, and at any hazard. We are not to wonder if fo poor a conduct as this foon brought king JAMES into contempt, mingled with indignation, amongft a people, eagerly bent on commerce, and in whom high notions of honor and a gallant fpirit had been infufed, by the example of queen ELIZABETH, and encouraged during the whole courfe of a long reign.

THESE things, and feveral others of the fame kind, which I omit, might however have been borne. The ridicule might have appeared lefs in the eyes of men accuftomed to it. The other faults might have been excufed, or foftened at leaft, by hopes of amendment. But there are fome things behind, which no excufe would alleviate, nor any patience endure. We fhall now bring them forward, and fhall fpeak of them under three heads.---The pretentions fet up, and the attempts made againft the freedom of this conftitution.---The management of parties.---The conduct of our national interefts abroad, againft the fenfe of the nation.

LETTER XX.

Fundamental principle, on which king JAMES affected A fundamental principle, on which king JAMES antered to establish his authority, was that of an hereditary right to the crown. This facred right, according to the political creed which he imposed, was not to be contested, much lefs to be fet afide; and yet this facred right was a meer chimaerá; contradicted by the general tenor of cuftom from the Norman invation to his time; by the declared fenfe of hisimmediate predeceffors; by many folemn proceedings of parliament; and by the express terms of law .--- Two families (for the race of PLANTAGENET was grafted on the Norman race,. and they may be reckoned properly as one) had furnished, indeed, all our kings; but this conftituted no hereditary right. When a prince of the royal family, but in a degree remote from the fucceffion, comes to the crown, in prejudice of the next heir, hereditary right is violated as really as it would be, if an abfolute ftranger to this family fucceeded. Such a prince may have another, and we think a better right; that, for instance, which is derived from a fettlement of the crown, made by the authority of parliament; but to fay he hath an hereditary right, is the groffeft abufe of words imaginable. This we think fo plain, that we fhould be afhamed to go about to. prove it; and yet there are men, in this age of paradoxes, either dull enough, or proftitute enough, to affert hereditary right, even in the cafe above-mentioned.

Our kings of the Norman race, were to far from fucceeding as next heirs to one another, and in a regular course of. descent, that no instance can be produced of the next heir's fuc-fucceeding, which is not preceded and followed by inftances of the next heir's being fet afide .--- Thus EDWARD the first fucceeded his father HENRY the third; but his father HENRY the third and his grandfather JOHN had both been raifed to the throne, in plain defiance of hereditary right; the right of ARTHUR, nephew to JOHN, and the right of ARTHUR's fifter, coufin-german to HENRY .--- EDWARD the fecond fucceeded his father EDWARD the first; but EDWARD the third deposed ED-WARD the fecond; the parliament renounced all allegiance to him; and EDWARD the third held the crown by a parliamentary title, as much as WILLIAM the third.--- If we go up higher than this æra, or descend lower, we shall find the examples uniform. Examples, sufficient to countenance this pretention of hereditary right to the crown of England, are to be found no where .--- But we haften to king JAMES ; who raifed, or, if . you pleafe, revived this pretention, fo needlefly for himfelf, and fo very unprofitably for his posterity.

THE British race began in HENRY the feventh; and from him alone king JAMES derived that right, which he afferted in fuch pompous terms; that undoubted right to the throne, as he called it in his first speech to parliament, which God, by birthright and lineal defcent, had in fulness of time, provided for him. Now furely, if ever any prince came to the crown without the least color of hereditary right, it was HENRY the feventh. He had no pretence to it, even as heir of the house of Lancaster. His wife might have fome, as heir of the house of York; tho' her hereditary title was not free from objections, which the character of EDWARD the fourth rendered probable; but the title of his wife had no regard paid to it either by him, or the parliament, in making this new fettlement. He gained the crown by the good-will of the people. He kept it by the confirmation of parliament, and by his own ability. The notional union of the two roles was a much better expedient for quiet than foundation of right. It took place in HENRY the eighth; it was continued in his fucceffors; and this nation was willing it fhould continue in king JAMES and his family. But neither HENRY the eighth, nor his fon EDWARD the fixth, who might have done fo with much better grace, laid the fame strefs on hereditary right as king JAMES did. One of them had recourfe to parliament on every occasion, where the fucceffion to the crown was concerned; and the other made no fcruple of giving the crown by will to his coufin, in prejudice of his fifter's right. This right, however, fuch as it was, prevailed; but the authority of parliament was called in aid by MARY, to remove the objection of illegitimacy, which lay against it. ELIZABETH had fo little concern about hereditary right, that fhe neither held, nor defired to hold her crown by any other tenure than the statute of the thirty-fifth of her father's reign. In the thirteenth of her own reign, fhe declared it by law high treason, during her life, and a praemunire, after her decease, to deny the power of parliament, in limiting and binding the defcent and inheritance of the crown, or the claims to it; and whatever private motives there were for putting to death MARY, queen of Scotland, her claiming a right, in opposition to an act of parliament, was the foundation of the public proceedings against her.

SUCH examples, as we have quoted, ought to have fome weight with king JAMES. A prince, who had worn the crown of Scotland, under fo many reftraints, and in fo great penury, might have contented himfelf, one would think, to hold that of England, whofe penfioner he had been, by the fame tenure, and to eftablifh his authority on the fame principles that had con-contented the best and greatest of his predecess; but his defigns were as bad as those of the very worst princes who went before him.

HAPPILY for Great Britain, he wanted the capacity of HENRY the feventh; the refolution of HENRY the eighth; and the favorable opportunities which they had the luck to find, or the art to contrive, of raifing prerogative, acquiring wealth, and encroaching on liberty.

WE observed, in discoursing on the reign of HENRY the feventh, that he had laid the foundations of an exorbitant power, before the nation was well aware of what he intended.---King JAMES, on the contrary, fhewed his whole game from the first. Besides the pleasure, which his vanity found in boafting of an abfolute, independent right to the crown, inherent in himfelf, he imagined that the transition would be eafy, and fo indeed it proved amongft many, from this to fome other useful apophthegms. He hoped to get, and he did get, an act of recognition of his right of fuccession; for we cannot perfuade ourfelves, with RAPIN, that he was indifferent on this point: and tho' this act, as well as the oath of fupremacy, which had been eftablished long before, and that of allegiance, which was established soon after, is in itself, as it hath proved in effect, but a feeble prop to support the pretence of hereditary right; yet king JAMES certainly looked on it as an admiffion of his claim, and meant a real advantage; where the parliament very probably meant nothing more than a compliment .--- This prince brought with him the true fpirit of a miffionary; and, by preaching a new doctrine, endeawored to establish a new power. From the notion of independent right was deduced the notion of independent authority; a right superior to law; an authority unbounded by it; a right, a right, which could not be proved; an authority, which might not be defined.---The inference from both these was obvious. This independent king must be accountable to God alone. He could not be accountable to man.

IF this excellent fystem of policy could have been generally imposed, his facred majesty might have battened, with great ease and delight, in the full funfhine of arbitrary power; and that he fhould fucceed in impofing it, his own vanity and the fervile flattery of his ministers had made him to expect. True it is, that the language he held was not fo plain, nor the efforts he made fo direct and violent, in the beginning of his reign, as they grew foon afterwards; but yet, if we confider the multitude of his proclamations; the nature of fome; the stile of all; the obedience he exacted to them; the acts of power which he exercifed ; those which he effayed ; and many other particulars of his conduct, which for brevity we omit; we must of course conclude, that he thought himself fure, at that time, of laying the foundations, fince he prepared to erect fo great a fuperstructure. He was deceived. Instead of making his impositions pass on the people, he only awakened their jealoufy. He had, in his own age, and he hath, in ours, the demerit of beginning a ftruggle between pre-rogative and privilege; and of eftablishing a fort of warfare between the prince and the people. But the fpirit of liberty baffled all his defigns. The spirit of liberty was not enervated by luxury in those days. It was not only alive, but vigorous and active. It role in the nation, as that of faction role at court. The fame principle which complied with queen ELIZABETH, refifted king JAMES. The opposition began as foon as the invation; and tyranny was, at leaft, nipt in the bud.

KING JAMES made one attempt, indeed, in the beginning of his reign, which bid fairer for fuccefs than any of those which he made afterwards; and which, if it had fucceeded, would have done the great work of his reign, by means more filent and more dangerous; more foft in appearance, and more deadly in effect. We mean the attempt he made on the privileges of the houfe of commons, in the cafe of elections. In the proclamation for calling his first parliament, he assumed a new and unjuftifiable prerogative, by his manner of prefcribing to the electors and to the elected ; and by fubjecting both to fevere penalties, if they failed, not only against the laws and flatutes, but against the purport, effect and true meaning of his proclamation. In the course of the feffion, he endeavored to put this prerogative in execution, by infifting first, that the commons should confer with the lords; and when this was refufed, that they fhould confer with the judges, on the merits of an election and return for the county of Buckingham, which they had already heard and decided. If the king had prevailed in this attempt of garbling the house of commons, he would have prevailed very probably in that which he made fome time afterwards, of imprisoning and punishing the members of it. Thus he might have intimidated those by one prerogative, whom he could not exclude by the other. Such an influence as must have refulted from hence, joined to that which the executive power gives unavoidably to every king, would foon have rendered the house of commons as dependent upon him, as the house of lords at that time appearedto be; for if money gets money, which will not, we suppose, be denied in this ftock-jobbing age, it is no lefs true, and perhaps no lefs vifible, that influence begets influence. Now we apprehend that, in this cafe, the barrier of liberty had been totally deftroyed, and that king JAMES would have virtually been in possession of arbitrary power; for whether the will of the prince becomes a law, by force of prerogative, and independently of parliament; or whether it is made fo, upon every occasion, by the concurrence of parliament, arbitrary power is alike eftablished. The only difference lies here. Every degree of this power, which is obtained without parliament, is obtained against the forms, as well as against the spirit of the conftitution; and must therefore be obtained with difficulty, and poffeffed with danger. Whereas in the other method of obtaining and exercifing this power, by and with parliament, if it can be obtained at all, the progress is easy and short; and the poffession of it is so far from being dangerous, that liberty is difarmed, as well as oppreffed, by this method; that part of the conftitution, which was inflituted to oppose the encroachments of the crown, the mal-administration of men in power, and every other grievance, being influenced to abet these encroachments, to support this mal-administration, and even to concur in imposing the grievances .---- National concurrence can be acquired only by a good prince, and for good purposes; because public good alone can be a national motive. But king JAMES was not ignorant that private good may be rendered a superior motive to particular men, and that it is morally possible to make even parliaments subservient to the worst purposes of a court. RICHARD the second, by influencing the elections, and queen MARY, by corrupting the members, had created fuch a dependence of the parliament on the court, that the first had well nigh established, in spight of all other opposition, his absolute power; and that the latter was able to fubvert what her father and her brother had done; to govern with the utmost cruelty; and to facrifice the interests of the nation to those of a husband, whom she took against the general inclination of her people .--- If therefore king JAMES could have created the fame dependence, he might have promifed himfelf the fame fuccefs. He might have governed in great great quiet and fafety, with the concurrence of parliament, tyrannically at home, and ignominioufly abroad. He might have beggared the nation, as he beggared himfelf, and have given an abfolute dominion over both to one infolent and incapable minister. But this concurrence could not be obtained; because the dependence of parliaments upon the king could not be created. By afferting their privileges, they prevented any direct and open influence of the crown. Had king JAMES been rich, and it was in his power to have been fo; had luxury and the offspring of luxury, corruption, both which he introduced, prevailed in the body of the people, an indirect and private influence might have been established; this nation might have been enflaved by the leaft beloved and moft defpifed of all her kings. But the king continued poor, and the nation honeft; this indirect and private influence was either not attempted, or attempted without effect; and we are perfuaded that no advocate for it could have been found, even in this reign, or the next. There were men wicked enough to afcribe fuch powers to the king, as would have deftroyed effectually the powers of parliament; but there was no man abfurd, as well as wicked enough, to allow those powers which are given to parliament by the constitution, and to argue for an expedient, which must of course render them ineffectual, or pervert them to purpoles oppolite to those for which they were inftituted. Thus liberty was preferved, by preferving the independency of parliaments. The proceedings of the commons, in the whole course of the affair we have mentioned, were extremely moderate. They went farther, not only in expressions and outward demonstrations of respect and submisfion, but in real compliances, than could have been expected, or that was perhaps strictly right; and when an expedient was fallen upon to draw the king, with fome reputation, out of the contest, they gave way to it, altho' by admitting a writ for Ppp 2 for the election of a member, in the room of one whole election they had allowed, they fuffered a precedent to be eftablished, which might be turned against them. But the spirit of liberty, tho' eafily alarmed, is flow to refent even great provocations, and to act with violence, even against the worst princes. Repeated injuries, imminent and extreme danger can alone bring things to fuch a pass; and no king of this nation was ever diffreffed by his people, without receiving frequent warnings, as well as accumulating infupportable griev-King JAMES felt fome part of this diffrefs in process of ances. time. He deferved it perhaps already. The commons however contented themfelves in an address to him, to affert their privileges, and to complain of this invafion of them, amongft other grievances .-- The proceedings of parliament were carried on in fubfequent feffions, with the fame moderation and temper. In that which followed the difcovery of the gunpowder treason, the oath of allegiance was imposed; and this pledge of fidelity, for the future, was the fole hardfhip, for fuch the court of Rome and a great number of that communion efteemed it, which the Roman-catholic party drew on themfelves by fo execrable an attempt. The parliament complied, on this occasion, with the king, probably against their own fentiments; fince nothing could be more different than his notions and theirs, concerning the conduct to be held with papifts, and even concerning popery itfelf; and fince the favor he shewed, not to fay the court he made to this party, had already created great uneafinefs, and began to be a most unpopular part of his government .---- He had no war on his hands, and his revenues were at leaft as confiderable as those of the late queen. The commons however gave him one of the greateft fupplies which had ever been given in parliament; and upon this occasion it may not be improper to observe, in confirmation of what we have advanced already, that the natural bent of the people, to live well with their kings, is fo ftrong, that parliaments under no other influence than this, will neglect nothing to gain them; nay, that a prince like king JAMES, difliked, diftrufted, defpifed, may prevail on his parliament, for a time, and till all hopes of gaining him are loft, to do as well as bear in his favor, what would not be attempted in a better reign, nor fucceed, perhaps, if it was attempted.

His defign of uniting the two kingdoms of England and Scotland failed. It was too great an undertaking for fo bad a workman. We must think that the general arguments against it were grounded on prejudice; on falfe and narrow notions. But there were other reafons, drawn from the jealoufies of that time, and from the conduct of the king, who had beforehand declared all the post-nati, or perfons born fince his accession to the English throne, naturalized in the two kingdoms; and these were, without doubt, the true reasons which prevailed against the union .---- The next time the parliament affembled, to proceed on bufinefs, was in the year 1610, and by that time the general difcontent of the nation began to fhew itfelf in loud and univerfal murmurs. Some monopolies, the rigid and impolitic proceedings of the high-commission court and star-chamber, and many other causes, combined to raife them. But no particular grievance either had, or deferved to have, fo great an effect as the continual endeavors which were used to establish practices and principles, absolutely destructive of the general conftitution of the English government .--- Such was the attempt made by BANCROFT, archbishop of Canterbury, when he prefented the twenty-five articles, commonly called Articuli cleri, and petitioned the king to grant prohibitions upon them .--- Such again were the books published by Cowel and BLACKWOOD, afferting that the king is neither bound by the laws, nor by his coronation-oath; that he hath a right to make make laws and impose taxes, without the consent of parliament; and that the nation was reduced to a flate of flavery by the Norman conqueft .--- Such, to conclude this head, were the many acts which the king himfelf had done, and the many declarations which he had made; nay, fuch was the declaration he made in this very parliament, when he affirmed that altho' "all kings, who are not tyrants, or perjured, will bound " themfelves within the limits of their laws; yet as it is blaf-" phemy to difpute what Gop may do, fo it is fedition in fub-" jects to difpute what a king may do in the height of his power." --- These doctrines were new, ungrateful and shocking to English ears; yet the parliament kept in temper, and bore fuch language from this fearful, bullying prince, as the fiercest of his predeceffors, fince RICHARD the fecond, had never prefumed to hold. They took no notice of BANCROFT, nor purfued any farther measures against Cowel and BLACKWOOD, after these libels had been called in by proclamation, and the reading of them had been forbid. Nay, there was a fubfidy granted in this very feffion, with as little pretence as there had been for granting the former .--- All this temper, fubmiffion and generofity of the parliament were loft on the king. They would not connive at grievances, nor facrifice liberty; and those were the only terms, upon which an union with him was to be obtained.--- From the year 1610 to 1614, he held no parliament; and it is evident, that he would never have called another, if his ministers could have supplied his profusion by all the illegal and oppreffive means, which they used to raife money on the people, and which we forbear to enumerate, because the most partial writers, who have endeavored to excufe them, have not prefumed to deny them .--- Even under this neceffity, he did not take the refolution of calling a new parliament, till he was prevailed on by his favorite, SOMERSET, who had formed a fcheme for influencing the elections, and, at the 3

the head of feveral other undertakers, flattered himfelf and his mafter, that he could get fuch members chofen, * " as " fhould comply folely to the king's defires." But this project proved abortive. " The Englifh freedom cannot be loft," fays WILSON; and may his faying prove true to all future generations! " by a few bafe and tame fpirits, that would un-" make themfelves and their pofterity, to aggrandize one man." It happened to king JAMES, as it happened to his fon. Difgrace at court proved a recommendation in the country; and the faces which appeared in this new parliament, made the countenance of the court to droop.

FROM this time began that conduct, on the part of the court, and on the part of the parliament, which continued to be held, with very fatal uniformity, till it ended in a civil war. That the people had reason to be jealous of the defigns of the court, hath appeared, and will appear still more flagrantly in the fequel; but that the court had at this time, nay even in the month of May 1640, when king CHARLES diffolved the last parliament he had it in his power to diffolve, any reason to be jealous of the parliament, or the people, we deny; and are able to justify our denial by fact and authority ; even the authority of my lord CLARENDON.-----But the father and the. fon, and efpecially the former, having no end in calling their parliaments but to get money from their people, and to evade rather than refuse the redress of grievances; the art of the court was conftantly employed, under pretence of the urgency of affairs, and in the parliament of 1614, without any pretence at all, to get the fubfidies first dispatched. The commons, on the other fide, who knew for what they were called together, and who expected that little time would be allowed.

them to enquire into mal-administration and to reprefent grievances, when they had once given the money, infisted for the most part, for there happened occasions, in which they did not infist, that the confideration of grievances should precede, or at least go an equal pace with that of the supply. This was the rock on which so many parliaments split. This alone occassioned the diffolution of that we are speaking of, and made king JAMES resolve, tho' he could not support his resolution to the end of his reign, to govern by his prerogative alone, and without the affistance of his parliament; that is, to avow absolute power.

IN our last discourse, concerning the pretensions fet up, and the attempts made by king JAMES against the freedom of the English constitution, we carried these remarks down to the year 1614. We chose to stop there, because it seems to be the very diametrical point of oppofition, or a point very near to that, between the government of this prince and the government of queen ELIZABETH, which we have fo largely infifted upon .--- The diftruft between him and his people was now entirely formed. His offenfive and their defenfive pretenfions were now fully explained. An union of affection between him and his people, which the latter ftill defired and had long courted, was now grown desperate. An union, unworthy of a free people, a factious union between the parliament and the court, founded in the dependence and fubmission of the former, and fo much affected by the latter, was after many trials become evidently impracticable. The king, as he had managed affairs, could never govern with parliament, nor without it; and those powers, which are defigned to be mutual helps, were turned to be mutual clogs on one another ; not by any deviation on the fide of the people, or of their reprefentatives, from the true line of government; but by a manifest and almost continual deviation from it, on the fide of the crown.

THUS were those great diforders in government and that national confusion raifed, which in a few years more deftroyed the whole constitution. In short, that melancholy scene, which had been preparing ever fince the accession of king JAMES, was opened about this time, and continued open with Vol. I. Qqq few few variations, every one of which was for the worfe, till that tragedy began, wherein the nobleft as well as the meaneft blood in the nation was fhed fo profufely, and with the beginning of which we purpofe to conclude thefe remarks.

WE have charged the whole, and we think very juftly, to the account of king JAMES; who attempted to govern England by foreign, not by English maxims; nay, by fuch as he was unable to govern his own country. Sure we are, that no part of it can be laid to the conflitution, or people of England. The conflitution was the fame in his time as in the time of queen ELIZABETH; and the people claimed under him, no other privileges, nor powers, than they had enjoyed under her. It was his fault, not theirs, if by treading in the fame path, which had kept them united with her, they were divided from him. Thefe are points, on which we think it proper to infift a little more in this place, in order to caft a greater light on the particulars which follow, and to avoid any prolix repetitions, when we come to wind up the whole.

KING JAMES had opened the parliament, which met in 1614, by afking money for the portion and other expences of his daughter's marriage to the elector Palatine, and promifed the commons leave and leifure to enquire into grievances, when they had complied with this demand; but diftruft, the bane of all harmony, prevailed amongft them, as it is plain even from this conditional promife that it prevailed with him, and they refolved to begin the work of the feffion by a reprefentation of grievances.

A PRINCIPAL article in this roll was the growth of popery, encouraged no doubt by feveral paffages in the conduct of king JAMES, and particularly by two; his employing not only fufpected, pected, but known Roman-catholics, in offices of the higheft trust and confequence; and his avowed defign of marrying his fon to fome princefs of that religion. Shall we fay, in the file of king JAMES, that it was prefumption in the commons to meddle in fuch deep matters of state? Shall we not rather think it was prefumption in the prince to determine a matter of this importance to the public welfare, to the prefent and to future generations, without the advice, nay against the opinion of the great council of the nation? Shall we not rather applaud the wifdom and forefight, as well as the virtue of those men, who difcovered the fruit in the feed; whofe minds foreboded all the mischievous consequences of such an alliance, and who did their utmost to prevent the true, original caufe of our greatest misfortunes?

UNDER another head of grievances, complained of at this time, were the monopolies, and many illegal exactions of money from the people. The parliament had the more reason to lose no time, and to spare no endeavors in putting a stop to these encroachments on liberty, because the longer they lasted, the more familiar they grew. The court improved in the practice of them. The people, who fubmitted to them by force, might have been brought to fubmit to them by cuftom, and the king might become able in time to fupply his wants without the affiftance of parliament; a cafe almost as desperate as that of his being able to supply them when, in what manner, and in what proportions he thought fit, by the affiftance of parliament. We fay almost as desperate, on the principles touched in our last letter; for, in the first place, if king JAMES could have fupplied his wants without parliaments, he would certainly have called none, and the condition of this nation had been worfe than that of Spain, of France, and of other nations, whofe examples have been abfurdly Qqq 2

furdly enough quoted, to justify these arbitrary methods of raifing money, and to induce mankind to fubmit to them. In France, for inftance, the people must fuffer; but they may complain. Their mouths are open; that is, their parliaments may reprefent, and even remonstrate; nay, they have gone fo far, as to refuse with fuccess to register and give the necessary forms of a law to an edict of the prince, which they judged oppreffive to the people. But if king JAMES had prevailed, he would have governed without even these shadows of a parliament. The people muft have fuffered, and could not have complained. Their fole mouth, the mouth of parliament, would have been stopped, and redress of grievances. being no longer attainable by the applications of their reprefentative body, which would have no longer exifted; they muft have fubmitted tamely and filently, or have fought a remedy in their collective body, which can only act by refiftance and force. This fituation would have been bad enough, God knows; yet not fo bad as the other; for, in the fecond place, if the parliament had been made dependent on the crown, no matter by what kind of influence; whether by the diftribution of honors, the translation of bishops, the corrupting the electors and the elected, or the other methods king JAMES took, the mouth of the people had not been ftopped indeed ; but it had been formed to speak another language than that of the heart .--- The people must have suffered, and the parliament must have rejoiced .--- If they had felt an increasing load of debt, the parliament must have testified great satisfaction at the diminution of it .--- If they had felt the decay of trade, and the growth of national poverty, the parliament must have boafted of the wealth and florishing state of the kingdom .---If they had feen the interest and honor of the nation, as they faw it too often, neglected or facrificed, the parliament muft have exulted in the triumphs of both .--- In fhort, fuch a depending pending parliament muft not only have connived at the grievances of their country, but have fanctified them too. They muft not only have borne the rod, but have kiffed it too; not only the rod of their prince, but the rod of fome upftart minifter, who owed his elevation to his difhonor, and his favor to his fhame.---But as the integrity of parliament fecured the nation from any danger of this kind; fo the neceffities of the king were the great fecurity againft any danger of the other.---Was the parliament therefore to blame, who oppofed ftrenuoufly every innovation fet on foot, to leften this fecurity?

A THIRD grievance, which the parliament defired to have redreffed, was that incredible wafte, which king JAMES made of the revenues of the crown. These revenues were, at that time, fo much more than fufficient for all the ordinary occafions of the government, that queen ELIZABETH, who had fo many extraordinary occasions of expence, who paid fo many old debts, without contracting new, and atchieved fuch glorious enterprizes abroad, as well as at home, did not receive in grants from her people above * four millions in more than forty years .--- If king JAMES, who had no extraordinary occafions of expence, who paid no debts, who atchieved no glorious enterprizes any where, had neither asked money, nor raifed it without asking, the squandering his revenue had not probably come under debate in parliament; but, fince he expected that the people should provide for his debts, and supply his necessities, it was just that the representatives of the people should examine how they were contracted. The immense estates, which were made in these days at court, the known corruption not only of inferior agents, but of principal ministers, and even of those who were at the head of the treasury, made such an examination the more neceffary, and provoked and excited the more to it. The house of commons would have thought that they had betrayed their truft, if they had neglected fo important a part of it. By the proceedings, as well as declarations of the parliaments in these times, it is plain that they thought they had not an arbitrary, but only a conditional power, over the purfe of the nation, tho' the ftrings of it were in their hands; that they were to tax the people in no greater proportion than was strictly necessary to support the honor and interest of the nation, and the dignity of the crown; that they could make no judgment concerning this proportion, if they had not a full communication of the nature of the fervice, for which extraordinary aids were demanded; and if they did not examine before they granted these aids, how the ordinary revenues and any precedent extraordinary grants had been applied. Such maxims as thefe will not be condemned, we prefume. They have been always professed and frequently purfued, from the time we speak of, down to the age in which we live. Since the reign of king WILLIAM the third, our princes have indeed stood on a different foot. They have had a diftinct revenue affigned to them for their particular use. The annual expences and the debts of the nation have been feparately provided for by parliament; and yet not only the management and application of these annual grants, but also the immenfe property of the creditors of the public have been left to the crown, as the management and application of those revenues were, which belonged properly to the crown, and by deficiencies, on which the crown, not the nation, was immediately affected. It is no wonder therefore if our parliaments have thought themfelves obliged, fince this great alteration, fometimes by committees, and fometimes by extraordinary 3 ordinary commissions, to inspect more narrowly into revenues, which are still managed by the officers of the crown, tho' they make no longer any part of the effate of the crown; and we perfuade ourfelves that no honeft man would be forry, if the wildom of our prefent reprefentatives should think fit to make any inquifitions of the fame nature; but even before this alteration, before the fettlement of a civil lift, and when our princes flood on the fame foot as king JAMES the first, with respect to their private and public revenue, the maxims we fpeak of were purfued on many occafions, and always with the universal applause of the people. In the reign of king CHARLES the fecond, for inftance, our whig-patriots endeavored not only to detect and punish frauds and abuses, by enquiries into the management of the public money, but to prevent them likewife, by appropriating what they gave to the uses for which it was given ; and thus much we think may fuffice, to clear the conduct of the parliament of 1614. from any imputations on this head.

* We do not want to be told that the value of money was very different at that time from what it is now; but tho' we admit of the higheft calculations, this fum will appear furprifingly finall for fo many years, when compared with the profusion and extravagance of fome latter reigns.

LET us mention, in this place, one grievance more, which we have touched upon in another. A former parliament had taken fome notice of it, and this parliament would probably have taken more, if the king had allowed them time. The doctrines which eftablifhed the unbounded and ineffable prerogative of the king; which reduced the privileges of parliament to be no longer an antient and undoubted right and inheritance, but derived them from the permiflion and toleration of the crown, and declared them liable to be retrenched at the will of the prince; and which by neceffary confequence changed at once the nature of the Englifh conftitution, from that of a free to that of an arbitrary government; all thefe doctrines, we fay, or the principles, on which they were eftablifhed, had been already publicly and frequently afferted by king king JAMES. They were the language of the court; and a party had been formed in the nation, who made profession of them. They were maintained in conversation. They were pleaded for in print; and they became soon afterwards the disgrace and prophanation of the pulpit.

WE have fometimes compared, in our thoughts, these usur-pations of king JAMES over the privileges of his people to those of the popes, which gave that prince fo much offence, over the rights of the emperors, and indeed over the civil rights of mankind. CHARLEMAGNE had made these pries princes. They continued for about two hundred and fixty years, to fubmit, in the main, to those rules, which the imperial conftitutions and ecclefiastical customs had established; after which they flarted, at once, out of these bounds. They would be limited pontiffs no longer, but arbitrary high priefts, like the dairo of Japan, fomething more than human, and civil as well as ecclefiastical tyrants. They fcorned to go to tyranny by degrees, but carried their usurpations at one leap to the utmost pitch of extravagance. ALEXANDER the fecond denied the right of the emperors to chuse, or to confirm the election of a pope. His fucceffor took the investitures from them. HENRY the fourth afferted the imperial rights, in opposition to this invalion; but GREGORY the feventh afferted, in oppofition to him, that Rome was the capital of the world; that the pope was independent of all powers on earth; that kings and emperors were liable to be deposed by the plenitude of his authority. The pope was believed by many, on his word; and there were more, who found their private account in feeming to believe him. Factions were raifed to maintain these principles. They were confectated by the church. They prevailed in those days. More than five centuries were not fufficient to abolish the practice, and more than fix have not been

been fufficient to extirpate the principle. True it is, that thefe. popes had feveral advantages, which king JAMES had not; and, amongft others, the minority of HENRY the fourth at the time when they began this monftrous usurpation; whereas when king JAMES fet up his pretenfions, and talked, and writ of prerogative, in terms as ridiculous and full of as much bombaft as those which the briefs and other public acts of HIL-DEBRAND contained, the commons of England were grown up to a full maturity of property and power. Shall we condemn them for endeavoring to preferve the principles of liberty, that they might preferve the fpirit of it; and by preferving the fpirit, deferve and fecure the continuance of fo great a bleffing ? Should an English parliament have fat quiet and filent, in humble dependence on the prince, whilft flavery in fpeculation, as well as practice, was making fuch large advances; whilft the laws of the land, the laws of nature, and those of God himfelf were perverted to impose a yoke of base and fervile prejudices on the understandings and confciences of mankind? We think not. Sure we are that our parliaments have been always watchful to cenfure and explode, in time, fuch doctrines as might, even by induction and confequence, weaken the foundation of liberty. The inftances of this kind are for well known, and fome of them fo recent, that we need not -quote them. But, in order to justify still farther the fense and. conduct of our fore-fathers, let us appeal even to the prefent fenfe of mankind. We all know that there are mercenary and abandoned wretches amongft us, who have dared to plead for a dependence of the parliament on the crown; not for that dependence of the feveral parts of the government on one another, which our conftitution hath formed, and on the prefervation of which the freedom of our government intirely refts; but for the most indirect, the most iniquitous, as well

as dangerous dependence imaginable ; for a dependence, to be created by corruption, which must always produce effects as infamous as its cause. Corruption, we fay, hath been defended, nay, recommended, for we will repeat the affertion, as a neceffary expedient of government. The representation of the country by the independent gentlemen of the country, hath been faucily and awkwardly ridiculed; as if a bill, to prevent all perfons, who have neither places nor penfions, from fitting in parliament, was proper to be passed, and those falutary laws, which are in force for preventing perfons who have places and penfions from fitting there, were as proper to be repealed. Nay, thefe incendiaries, who go about to deftroy our conftitution, have not blushed in the same breath to admit, that standing armies have been generally the instruments of overturning free governments, and to affirm that a flanding army is neceffary to be kept up in ours; if you alk them againft whom, they answer you very frankly, against the people; if you ask them why, they answer you with the same frankness, because of the levity and inconstancy of the people. This is the evil; an army is the remedy. Our army is not defigned, according to these doctors of flavery, against the enemies of the nation, but against the nation. We are confident that the prefent army is incapable of being employed to fuch purpofes, and abhors an imputation, which might have been juftly caft on CROMWELL's army, but is very unjuftly infinuated against the prefent.

Now let us fuppose that the time was come, when the parliament should think fit to cenfure and put a stop to the influence of fuch writings as these; would any honest man, if he laid his hand upon his heart, difapprove their proceedings? On the contrary, would not every man, who wifhed that the con-conflitution of this government might be preferved, applaud fuch measures and bless the representatives of his country for their zeal against the betrayers of it?

UPON the whole matter, we think it very plain that the alarm, which was taken at the propagation of those infamous doctrines, in the reign of king JAMES the first, is abundantly justified not only by the examples of other parliaments, but by the general fense of mankind in all ages.

WHENEVER the fundamentals of a free government are attacked, or any other fchemes, ruinous to the general intereft of a nation, are purfued; the beft fervice that can be done to fuch a nation, and even to the prince, is to commence an early and vigorous opposition to them; for the event will always fhew, as we fhall foon fee in the prefent cafe, that those who form an opposition in this manner, are the trueft friends to both, however they may be ftigmatifed at first with odious names, which belong more properly to those who throw the dirt at them.

IF the oppofition begin late, or be carried on more faintly, than the exigency requires, the evil will grow; nay it will grow the more by fuch an oppofition, till it becomes at length too inveterate for the ordinary methods of cure; and whenever that happens; whenever ufurpations on natural liberty are grown too ftrong to be checked by thefe ordinary methods, the people are reduced to this alternative: They muft either fubmit to flavery and beggary, the worft of all political evils; or they muft endeavor to prevent the impending mifchief by open force and refiftance, which is an evil but one degree lefs eligible than the other. But when the oppofition is begun R r r 2 early early and carried on vigoroufly, there is time to obtain redrefs of grievances, and put a ftop to fuch ufurpations by thofe gentle and fafe methods, which their conftitution hath provided; methods, which may and have often proved fatal to wicked minifters, but can never prove fatal to the prince himfelf.---He is never in danger but when thefe methods, which all arbitrary courts diflike, are too long delayed.

THE most plausible objection to fuch proceedings, and by which well-meaning men are frequently made the bubbles of those who have the worst defigns, arises from a false notion of moderation. True political moderation confifts in not oppofing the measures of government, except when great and national interests are at stake; and when that is the cafe, in oppofing them with fuch a degree of warmth, as is adequate to the nature of the evil, to the circumstances of danger attending it, and even to those of opportunity. To oppose upon any other foot; to oppose things which are not blame-worthy, or which are of no material confequence to the national intereft, with such violence as may diforder the harmony of government, is certainly faction; but it is likewife faction, and faction of the worft kind, either not to oppose at all, or not to oppose in earnest, when points of the greatest importance to the nation are concerned.

THE truth of all this reafoning will be confirmed by what remains to be faid of king JAMES and king CHARLES the firft. ----If there had not been an early and honeft opposition, in defence of national liberty, againft king JAMES, his reign would have fufficed to establish him in the feat of arbitrary power.----If the opposition had been more generally backed with the weight of the nation in due time; if the court had not not been able to divide men against their general interest, upon principles of prerogative and liberty, king JAMES muft have complied in time; the conftitution would have been refettled on it's right foundation ; his family would have been preferved; all our national calamities would have been prevented; and the fins of the court might have been explated by the punishment of one or two of the ministers.---But a prerogative party having been nurfed up from the beginning, and gained strength in the whole course of king JAMES'S reign, the strength of the nation was divided, and the conteft continued fo long between the king and the people, that refentment and passion and prejudice and faction took place on all fides. The foft and gentle methods of cure, which our conftitution had provided, became impracticable. A provoked people fought their remedy in refiftance. A civil war followed. The English government was subverted, inftead of being reformed.

WHAT hath been faid will ferve to justify the conduct of the parliament, as well as the general alarm, which the nation had taken in 1614. These were the crimes, the heinous, unpardonable crimes, for which king JAMes diffolved this parliament, with fo much indignation, after they had fat but a few weeks, and had not time given them to pass even one law. These were the crimes, for which he confined to the Tower and other prifons, and punished in other ways, fo many of the most active members. Lastly, these were the crimes which made him refolve, what he had before attempted, to govern without parliament .--- The particular consequences of these measures will appear in our next letter, when we come to confider his conduct of our national interefts abroad, against the fense of the nation; in 3 in which period of time, the foreign affairs are fo intermixed with parliamentary and domestic affairs, that we shall not divide them, but speak of them together, having first very briefly made our observations on his management of parties.

N letter XVIII, we have fpoken of the ftate of parties at the acceffion of king JAMES. We are now to make our obfervations on his management of them. It is neceffary we fhould do this, in order to give a complete and juft idea of his government; and yet fo much hath been faid on the fubject by writers of all denominations, and even by ourfelves, that there remains but very little to be added, either for curiofity, or inftruction.

WE might obferve how he drew himfelf into fome trouble, if not danger, and exposed himfelf to the neceffity of shedding fome blood, in the very first months of his reign, by espousing the passions of a party; by disgracing and proferibing men, who had no crime at that time towards him but their attachment to the late queen; by avowing the cause of the earl of Essex, whose designs had been, no doubt, as treasonable, at least, and as chimerical too, as those into which he drove GREY, COBHAM and RALEIGH, or which were imputed to them.

SEVERAL other anecdotes, concerning factions at court and parties in the nation, might be collected and remarked upon. But we fhall pafs them over, and confine ourfelves to obferve, in a very few inftances, how he adapted his particular management of parties to the general and main defign of his policy; what ftrength he acquired; what ftrength he loft by this conduct; and what contefts he entailed on pofterity.

THERE

THERE were no parties, at this time, in the nation, but fuch as were formed on religious differences; and it had been a great object of the policy of queen ELIZABETH, to keep all parties within these bounds. We know the maxims on which the proceeded, by a letter of fir FRANCIS WALSINGHAM, writ expresly on this subject. She thought that "confciences were " not to be forced, but won and reduced by truth, time, in-" ftruction and perfuation; and that caufes of confcience " lofe their nature, when they exceed their bounds and grow " matter of faction." --- By keeping to thefe maxims, the fucceeded. The parties in the church made none in the state. They were obliged to live in due fubjection to laws, wifely made and moderately exercifed. They were never punished, whilft they continued in this fubjection, much lefs were they provoked or encouraged to go out of it. The powers of the church were applied to the fupport of the cftablishment, not rendered fubfervient to any factious defigns of the court; and ecclefiaftical violence was reftrained from confirming the obftinacy of those who diffented, by perfecution of them, or from increasing their numbers, by perfecution of others.

DIRECTLY opposite to this conduct was that of king JAMES. ---In hafte to shew his parts, he had a conference between the bishops and the puritan ministers at Hampton-court, in a few months after his accession; where he made himself a principal party in the dispute. His courtiers flattered him, and archbishop WHITGIFT, who died foon afterwards, and probably doated then, declared himself "verily perfuaded that "the king spake by the spirit of God." But surely such a confidence, however it might frighten and filence, could neither instruct, nor perfuade; and the king was so far from trusting, like his predecessor, to the force of truth and the aid of time, that in this very conference he threatened to employ another kind kind of force, if he did not meet with compliance in a time to be limited. The bifhops were at first to admonish paternally and to confer amicably; but left they fhould not fucceed by preaching, writing and living men into conformity, the fole means they ought to defire; or, if they defired others, the fole means they ought to be fuffered to employ, they were to have recourse to compulsion afterwards .--- The fame spirit reigned in the first speech which this prince made to his parliament; for there he not only maffed together, imprudently as well as unjustly, all the diffenters from the established church, under the general denomination of puritans and novelifts, but he declared them all " infufferable in any well-governed com-"mon-wealth :" fo that he put them all out of his protection, even tho' they confined themfelves within those bounds, to which causes of confcience may reasonably extend, and proferibed them for their opinions, not their practices.

· On these principles he proceeded, and what we have faid here may fuffice, upon this head, for his whole reign .--- The confequence of this conduct was that those fects, who were not dangerous at first, became so at last. They became so, in fome degree, from the moment the declarations we have mentioned were made : for nothing is found more true in nature and experience than this; that they who are opprefied by governments, will endeavor to change them; and that he who makes himfelf terrible to multitudes, will have multitudes to fear .--- But this was not all .--- As he made these fects his enemies, fo he gave them great advantages of popularity and strength .--- The first of these advantages which we shall take notice of, arofe from the great indulgence he shewed to the Roman catholics, and the favorable fentiments of that religion, which he expressed on all private, and many public occasions. We need not descend into the particular instances; Sff for VOL. I.

for tho' we give little credit to DEAGEANT's memoirs in general, and none to what he fays of a letter, written by king JAMES to the pope, acknowledging him vicar of CHRIST and head of the church; yet is there a multitude of other proofs, too notorious and too well supported to be denied .--- We think it plain, upon the whole matter, that feveral paffages in hisconduct, both before and after his coming into England, were unworthy of a protestant king at any time, and were equally impolitic at this time, when the zeal of papifts to attack, and of protestants to defend the reformation was at the highest pitch; and when even the leaft condefcenfion on either fide, would have been thought little lefs than apoftacy. Fear forhis perfon, and little notions of policy were probably the motives, which determined this part of his conduct ; but whatever the motives were, the effect was certainly this. He made the cause of the court to pass amongst many for the cause of popery; and it was not hard by confequence for the puritans, who were oppressed by the court, to make their cause pass for that of the reformation. We are far from thinking that this was properly the cafe on either fide; but the appearances were strong enough to fix such prejudices in the minds of men, already prepared by jealoufy and fufpicion. This advantage, fo foolifhly given, operated ftrongly against the court, both in this reign and the next. In this it was applied to no ill purpofes. In the next, it was very wickedly improved; but they who gave it first, and who continued to give it afterwards, are juftly to be reputed the accomplices of those who improved it fo wickedly, how much foever they flood in opposition to one another.

A SECOND advantage of popularity and ftrength, which king JAMES gave to the puritans, was this: He ranked amongst their party, nay he drove into that party, as much as 7 he

he was able by fevere ulage, all those who ftood up in defence even of civil liberty. The averfion which he expressed to the puritans, formed a kind of league between him and the warmest of the established clergy; and when these were once become a court party, we are not to wonder if others grew as warm as thefe, and if the greatest part of that body of men united in a caufe which flattered their passions, and opened the road of preferment to them. No king no bifhop, was the language of the court. No bishop no king, was that of the church. Had the monarchy and the hierarchy been attacked, this united zeal in a common caufe would have been commendable and fuccessful too; for the nation was not now, nor for a long time afterwards, so distempered, that any faction could raise it's head with effect against the just prerogative of the crown and the eftablished rights of the church. But the truth requires we should fay, that this union was formed to offend and invade, and to extend both beyond the bounds prefcribed to them by the English constitution. It was great blindness in the clergy not to fee that to enlarge the bottom of the court, they narrowed their own; that they fixed a center of union, wherein all their divided enemies would meet and unite with many, who were then friends to the church, but might come, as it happened afterwards, from being against the clergy to be against the church itself. It was a great misfortune to the nation, that the clergy did not fee thefe truths in time; fince if they had feen them, they might have been happy inftruments of preventing that mifchief which followed foon after the time we fpeak of, and that division of interests between the crown and the people, which was created by king JAMES, and hath proved fo fatal to his posterity .--- But to return.--- By a contrary conduct, by espoufing and fanctifying the principles and by promoting the measures of king JAMES, the clergy became part of the faction of the court, and fhared very unjuftly the Sff 2 imimputation of favoring popery, but very juftly that of advancing tyranny. This was a fecond advantage, which king JAMES gave to the puritans. He varnifhed their caufe with popularity, and he increafed their numbers. He made puritans in his time, as Janfenifts have been fince made in France, and Jacobites in Britain, by calling men fo and by treating them as fuch.---They muft have been fharp-fighted, indeed, of whom. my lord CLARENDON fpeaks, and who could difcern " the re-" bellion contriving from, if not before, the death of queen. " ELIZABETH ;" but they muft be quite blind, who do not difcern the feeds of rebellion fowing in every part of the conduct of king JAMES, and particularly in this which we have: now touched ; the management of parties.

THESE evils were aggravated, and the confequences of them were precipitated by his conducting our national interefts abroad against the fense of the nation.

DURING the first period, into which we divide this reign, that is, to the year 1614, king JAMES meddled little, and, to fay the truth, had little occasion to meddle in foreign affairs ... --- The treaty which he made with Spain in 1604, had been. much cenfured, and fir C. CORNWALLIS, in a letter to the lord? CRANBURNE, afferts "that England never loft fuch an opportu-" nity of winning honor and wealth unto it, as by relinquish-" ing the war against an exhausted kingdom and a prince. " held in little veneration for fuffering himfelf to be wholly, " governed by a man generally hated." This treaty, however, was not probably fo bad as it had been reprefented, and. the commerce opened with Spain became a fource of inexhaustible riches to our nation; but still there was fomething, prepofterous and mean in the conduct of king JAMES abroad, even whilft he had to little to do there, and to fafe a part to act.

act. He courted that very power, the power of Spain, whomqueen ELIZABETH had broke, and who would have courted him, if he had known how to put fo much as dignity in his proceedings. He difobliged the Dutch, whole power had been raifed by queen ELIZABETH, and who must have continued to depend on him, if he had known how to be either a friend, or an enemy; and yet he bore most ignominiously from this very people the greatest injuries and affronts imaginable. He had neither the courage to chastife this infant state, nor the fense to protect it. Their treaty with their old mafters, the Spaniards, began in the year 1607; was continued in 1608; and ended in 1609, in a truce of twelve years. During the whole course of this long negotiation, king JAMES fhewed his partiality in favor of the Spaniards; and tho' he figned, about this time, two treaties with the States as fovereigns; yet he made no fcruple, upon fome occafions, of declaring them rebels .--- The death of the duke of CLEVES, and the difputes about that fucceffion, prefented to HENRY the fourth an opportunity he waited for; and he was ready, when RAVAILLAC stabled him, to attack the house of Austria, whofe power in Germany began once more to give umbrage, tho' RODOLPHUS the fecond was still on the imperial throne ... King JAMES left his troops with the Dutch, notwithstanding. the truce. They were employed in this quarrel; and we can-not think him to blame for taking no farther part in the hofti-lities. His views were, and they ought to have been, at this time, and in this refpect, very different from those of that heroical king of France. But in the new scene of German affairs, which opened a few years afterwards, and which continued, during the last period of his reign, that is, from the year 1614, nothing could be more fcandalous than his taking no part at all, except his taking the part he did take .--- That : he fhould have made himfelf a principal in that terrible war, which which broke out in Germany in 1618, and which lasted thirty years, we cannot perfuade ourfelves; neither do we believe that any man, who does not take up his opinions on truft, but examines this intricate and perplexed part of the hiftory of the laft century with care, will be of another mind; and yet king JAMES must have made himself a principal in this war, if he had engaged in it, as he was advised by fome to engage, and as he hath been blamed by many for not engaging .--- The cenfures, under which he hath paffed on this occafion, would have been juster, if those who have made them, had diftinguished better between the patrimony of his children, by defending the Palatinate, and promoting their grandeur, by feconding their ambition; between contributing to fupport the protestant interest abroad, and taking on his shoulders a load, which it was neither reafonable nor poffible that he should bear; between that conduct, which he ought to have held, as king of this island, and that which he might have been obliged to hold, if his dominions had lain on the continent. Our writings will not pass, we believe, for apologies in favor of king JAMES; and yet we shall explain this point a little lefs to his difadvantage, perhaps, than it hath been ufually taken.

IF king JAMES had followed the advice of thofe who would have had him enter into an immediate war to maintain the elector Palatine on the throne of Bohemia, he muft have exhaufted and ruined this nation to fupport it. He muft have furnifhed fubfidies to BETHLEM GABOR and the prince of AN-SPACH; he muft have fed the war in Hungary; fomented the revolt in Auftria; paid the army of the princes of the union; oppofed the duke of Bayaria in Bohemia, and SPINOLA in the Palatinate.---Let us confider in oppofition to whom, and in concert with whom, he muft have carried on this vaft undertaking.---On one fide, the whole popifh intereft in the empire Was was closely united, and the cause of FERDINAND was the common caufe of the party. The popifh interest, out of the empire, confpired in the fame caufe. The king of Poland affifted the emperor in Hungary. Troops from Italy and a great army from the Netherlands acted for him in Germany. The purfe of the pope and that of the king of Spain were open to him. Even France, who ought in good policy to have oppofed the houfe of Auftria, was induced, by the bigotry of her court, and, perhaps, by the private interest of LUINES, to declare for the emperor against the king of Bohemia .--- On theother fide, the protestant interest, in the empire, was far from being closely united, and farther still from making the caufe of FREDERIC the common cause of the party. Even the princes of the union had different views; many of them leaned to the emperor; none of them could be intirely depended upon; and the elector of Saxony, the most powerful of the protestant princes of the empire, was fo far from uniting with the others, that he was first privately, and afterwards openly; but all along very fleadily on the fide of FERDINAND. Out of the empire, fome affiftance might have been expected from the king of Denmark and the Dutch; but even their acceffion must have been purchased; at least, it must have been made useful, at the expence of Britain. What other allies could king JAMES have hoped for ; and who can fee, without fmiling, in that godly prelate, archbishop ABBOT's letter to fir ROBERT NAUNTON, the name of the duke of BOUILLON, together with TREMOUILLE, a rich prince in France, mentioned upon fuch an occafion ?---Short and imperfect as the account we have given is, those who know the state of Europe at the time we fpeak of, know that it is true; and if we were to look no farther than the reprefentations made by JULIANA of Nassau to her fon, against his accepting the crown of Bohemia, we should discover in them, with the true and fatal reasons why why king JAMES did not affift FREDERIC at all, unanfwerable reasons why he ought not to have taken upon him the Bohemian quarrel in the manner he must have taken it, if he had taken it upon him at that time. That king JAMES should have prepared for this ftorm, which was long in gathering; that he fhould have labored to unite and to fortify the protestants of Germany, before it happened; and to comfort and fuccour and protect them, after it happened ; that he had many fair opportunities of doing this, without engaging farther than the interest of Britain allowed; and that he neglected them all, we admit, and are able to fhew .--- He might have put himfelf on fuch a foot in Europe, as to have mediated at least, which was the only part he attempted to act, fuccefsfully for the Bohemians, and to have screened his fon-in-law from the vengeance of the emperor, and the ambition of the duke of Bavaria. But he put himfelf on fuch a foot, and he acquired fuch a character, that he had no credit among the protestants, nor much influence over his fon-in-law, and that the Romancatholic party, fure of amufing him, neglected and defpifed him. He might have declined taking the Bohemian quarrel. upon him, and yet not have made his court to the emperor and the king of Spain, by difavowing and condemning FRE-DERIC, and even by fuffering them not only to drive this prince out of Bohemia, but to take the Palatinate from him and his family, and give a wound, almost mortal, to the whole protestant cause in Germany. Nay, he did worfe. By foolifh embassies and ridiculous negotiations, he gave time and furnished advantages, which could not have been had without his affiftance, to the popifh party. By the fame means he checked, he weakened, he difcouraged, and more than once difarmed the protestant party. In short, not only the principles of his conduct were wrong, but the measures of it composed fuch a series of blunders as we seldom find in history; becaufe

IT may be objected, perhaps, by fome of the writers, who adorn and instruct the prefent age, that king JAMES was univerfally and juftly condemned for not taking the Bohemian quarrel upon him, as well as for not defending the Palatinate ; and that he must have purfued, in the last case, the same meafures as we think him justified for not purfuing in the former. We shall not refute this objection by shewing, as it would be eafy for us to do, in various particulars, the prodigious difference between the two cafes; the infuperable difficulties he would have encountered in one, and the many facilities he would have had in the other. The deduction would be too long and extensive for the narrow limits of these effays. But we shall content ourfelves with making two observations, fufficient to fatisfy any reasonable man, and which will shew, at the fame time, what different notions of the part this nation ought to take in foreign affairs, were entertained by our forefathers, from those, which we, their wifer offspring, have purfued. When king JAMES took the refolution of calling the parliament, which fat in 1621, the battle of Prague was loft, and Bohemia too with it. The * affections of the people were raifed, but it was for the recovery of the Palatinate; and in this point the fense of the parliament went along with the affections of the people. On the other point, the fenfe of the parliament had not been expressed, there having been no parliament held from the year 1614 till this time. But what this fense would have been, may be easily collected, from the advice given in the petition and remonstrance of the commons at this time. As zealous as they were to engage even in a war, for recovering the Palatinate, they were not enough tranfported by their zeal, or enough biassed in favor of any foreign interest, to forget the true interest of Britain. They advised the king to a war; but they advised him not to reft upon a war in those parts only, which would confume his treasure and discourage his people. They advised that the bent of this war might be against that prince, the king of Spain, whose armies and treasures had first diverted and fince maintained the war in the Palatinate. On which fide now was the fenfe of the nation; and how impertinent are they who have quoted this fenfe, to authorize our taking part in every German quarrel, by paying fubfidies, maintaining armies, and involving ourfelves in all the affairs of the continent? How monftrous is. the abfurdity and impudence of * those who have afferted that the cafe of the people of the Palatinate, invaded by a powerful enemy, who pretended to nothing lefs than the conquest of them, is parallel to that of the people of Hanover, invaded by no body, and over whom no foreign power pretends to any dominion !--- The parliament pointed out to king JAMES a measure effectual for supporting the protestant interest abroad; but fuch a measure as this nation might pursue by exerting her natural ftrength .--- The power of Spain supported the emperor and the popifh league; an army of Spain conquered the Palatinate; and yet the artifices of that court deluded king JAMES to fuch a degree, that he dreamed of recovering the patrimony of his children by the good offices of the Spaniards, and was incapable of purfuing in earnest, any other measures, even at the time when SPINOLA was ftripping them of this patrimony, and reducing them to feek their bread in another country. To this dependence in Spain he facrificed not only them, but his own honor, the affection of his fubjects, the profperity of his kingdoms, and the fecurity of the proteftant religion. It was this magic charm, which the parliament endeavored in vain to diffolve, by prefling him to a war with Spain, which his maritime force could have carried on principally; which would have ftopped that fource from whence the popifh party in Germany derived fo many fupplies; and which would have rendered the proteftant party, by confequence, a more equal match for the emperor.---But this was not the fole wife and honeft view, which the parliament propofed, by pointing out and infifting on this meafure. There was another, which touched them more nearly, and which they had more at heart. We fhall mention it in our next difcourfe, and it will lead us from our obfervations on this reign to those few on the next, with which we intend to close, at least for the prefent, all our remarks on the history of England.

A NOTHER object, befides recovering the Palatinate, which the parliament had in view, when they prefied king JAMES to break with Spain, was preventing the marriage of the prince of Wales to the infanta. He had been bantered and abufed by the Spaniards, when he treated a marriage between his eldeft fon, prince HENRY, and ANNE of Auftria; and yet no fooner did the duke of Lerma, in the year 1616, make fome overtures of marrying the infanta MARY, fecond daughter of PHILIP the third, to prince CHARLES, but this So-LOMON of ours catched at the bait which was thrown out to him, and hung faft on the hook for feven years together.

THE scheme of farther usurpations in Germany was already. laid by the house of Austria; and the character of FERDI-NAND, who was to fucceed MATTHFAS, and who did fucceed him three years afterwards, gave hopes of pushing these usurpations with vigor and advantage .--- The part of Spain had been great in promoting these designs. It was effential to their fuccefs that it should be fo likewife in the execution of them. No opposition, of any moment, was to be apprehended from. France, where the principles of defpotifm and of bigot-popery prevailed more than ever, and who had concluded, in the year 1615, a double marriage with Spain. The truce of. twelve years, made with the Dutch in 1609, would enable. the Spaniards to support the popish league from the low countries, as in all cafes they might do from Italy; and if they could keep the king of Great Britain from diverting the forces: of Spain in the mean time, there was reason to hope that these. united united powers might conquer both the Palatinates, as well as Bohemia, and break the force of the protestant league in Germany, before the expiration of the truce and the renewal of the war with the united provinces of the low countries should create another diversion.--- This was a principal part of the plan laid by the houfe of Auftria and the other roman catholic princes, for oppreffing the protestants and invading the liberties of Germany. To the eternal infamy of king JAMES, it fucceeded even beyond the hopes of those who laid it .----The hints which DIGBY gave him in the very beginning of this. negotiation, might have put him on his guard, and a thousand things, which happened in the courfe of it, would have undeceived, provoked and determined any other man. His prefumption, his fear, and; above all, his perverse system of policy, prevented any effects of these kinds. We forbear entering into the particulars of what he did for Spain; of what he fuffered Spain to do; and of all the indignities, which he received from every branch of the house of Austria, during these transactions. Most of them have been observed, and are fufficiently known; and it would be an unneceffary work to point out fome few inftances more, which have not been, perhaps, taken notice of, or explained as much as they deferved. We shall spare ourfelves and our readers this difagreeable recollection, and only observe in general the plan upon which king JAMES appears to have acted; as we have obferved what the plan was of those who made to fatal an ufc of his weaknefs. His filly pride could not be fatisfied, unlefs he matched his fon with a daughter of Spain, or France. He had been difappointed formerly on that fide, and lately on this. He was refolved at any rate not to be difappointed a third. time. The immense sum which had been promised for the infanta's portion, tempted him the more, becaufe for feveral years he would call no parliament to grant him fupplies, and he:

he found it hard to raife them, even in fmall proportions, without a parliament. He imagined vainly, that this alliance with Spain would give him great confideration abroad; and wickedly, that it would afford him means of raifing and extending his prerogative at home. He faw the mifchiefs which accrued to the protestant interest abroad, either as immediate, or as remote effects of his conduct; either in confequence of what he did, or in confequence of what he neglected; and we are willing to believe that he felt, in fome degree, those which fell on the family into which he had married his daughter. But the interest of the protestants in general touched him little. Abroad, as well as at home, he chofe rather by condefcenfions and fubmissions to court his enemies, than to unite his friends among one another, and to attach them to himfelf. In his zeal for the imaginary rights of princes, he could not forgive the elector Palatinate for taking arms against the emperor; and whilft he looked on him as a rebel, forgot that he was his fon. If he remembered it at any time, and felt any concern, the fentiment was furely very faint; fince we find that the diftant and uncertain prospect of making some tolerable compolition for this unhappy prince, by the interceflion of Spain, was always fufficient to calm his paternal folicitude. He faw, without doubt, at least during the life of PHILIP the third, who did not die till the year 1621, that Spain was not much in earnest to give him the infanta; but he seemed resolved to overcome all difficulties, and to determine the councils of Spain, and even of Rome, in his favor, by dint of concessions. The truth is, he went fo far in his concessions at last, that these councils seemed to be determined. Those of Spain, at leaft, were fo most certainly in the year 1623, even before the voyage of the prince into Spain; and the articles fworn to both by him when he was there, and by his father here, amounted to little less than a direct establishment of popery. That

That this charge is juft will, we think, appear evident, when it fhall be remembered, without entering into more particulars, that by thefe articles the king and prince of Wales engaged for the fufpenfion, and even abrogation of all laws made againft Roman catholics; that they engaged never to confent to the making any new laws of the fame kind; and that, as the children to be born of this marriage were to be educated by their mother, till ten years of age, in compliance with the king of Spain's demands; fo the prince was prevailed on to promife that he would lengthen this term till twelve years, according to the defire of the pope.

THUS was king JAMES amused till the beginning of the year 1623, when the Upper Palatinate and the dignity of elector. were taken from FREDERIC and conferred on the duke of BA-VARIA, by the diet of Ratifbon : or, to fpeak more properly, by the prerogative of FERDINAND, who acted in the diet as dogmatically and as abfolutely as king JAMES endeavored to act in his parliaments. When this point was gained by amufing king JAMES, and the protestant interest was broken in Germany; the next point was to be carried by concluding with him and making the match on fuch terms, as might fecure an immediate toleration, and open the prospect of a future eftablifhment of popery in this kingdom .--- The parliament of 1621 beheld part of this scene, and apprehended, upon very just grounds, the fequel. They faw the fatal confequences of the negotiation, whilft it was in fuspence, and they dreaded those which would follow the conclusion of it. To ftop the first, and to prevent the last, there was but one expedient ; the forcing king JAMES into a war, for recovering the palatinate. This they endeavored wth all their might; but he meant nothing lefs, and had called a parliament purely to get money from his people, on pretence of a war he was refolved not to make. Some money he got by this trick; but when he had fquandered it away in trifling negotiations and a ridiculous shew of war, he could get no more : fo that this parliament ended as others had done, and even with greater diffatiffaction between the king and the people, both on account of his conducting foreign affairs against the interest and sense of the nation, and of his attacking more openly than ever the privileges of parliament. The parliament remonstrated, petitioned, protefted. The king diffolved the parliament in a rage; imprisoned feveral members of the house of commons, and even fome of the houfe of lords. He refumed his project of governing without parliaments, fince he could not govern as ill as he had a mind to govern with them. But this project was not purfued above two years; for what his parliament could not obtain from him, an unworthy favorite did obtain. Motives of private interest, and perhaps of a worse nature, made that great turn in affairs, which fo many motives of a public nature and of national interest had never been able to make. In fhort, a cabal at court prevailed on this prince to alter his conduct in those very points, on which the parliament, feconded by the clamors of the whole nation, had been never able to prevail .--- We shall not attempt to guess, as many have done, at the fecret reafons, which determined BUCKINGHAM, nor at those by which he determined the prince of Wales to undertake the romantic and, in every light, ridiculous journey into Spain, to carry the treaty of marriage to a conclusion; then to break it off again in fo abrupt and ungracious a manner; and to become fo earnest for engaging in a war with Spain. Whatever these reasons were, the reason given for breaking the match was not the true one. The restitution of the Palatinate had been very cooly preffed, not to fay neglected, even whilft the prince was at Madrid; and yet after he came from thence, the king of Spain had figned an act, by which

which he engaged for this restitution: fo that on the principles on which this negotiation had been conducted, there feemed to be no reason for breaking it off given by Spain at the time when it was broken. But the parliament which king JAMES called upon this occafion, proceeded like the laft, on other principles than the court had done, and was therefore, very confiftently with these principles, ready to feize the opportunity offered, by advifing the king to break the match, and enter into a war for recovering the Palatinate, and by giving him very large fupplies for this purpofe .--- We cannot, upon this occafion, fubscribe to the censure passed by my lord CLAREN-DON, how much foever we efteem his hiftory, and honor the memory of that noble historian; for in the first place, the fupplies given by this last parliament of king JAMES, were not only very large, as we have just now faid, but they were fuch as the king was contented with, and thanked the parliament for, in his answer to the speaker of the house of commons. Secondly, we cannot agree that it was the parliament, properly fpeaking, who prevailed on the king, and engaged him in the war. The parliament advifed him to it indeed ; but nothing can be more manifest than this, even by my lord CLARENDON'S own account, that the measure was refolved on before, and that it was the measure of the prince and of BUCKINGHAM, which the king, however unwillingly, adopted. The parliament in truth did no more than advife him to break a treaty which he had already broken; and those who reflect on precedent paffages, will eafily concur with us, that if this had not been the cafe, it would not have been in the power of the parliament to break the match; much less to engage the king in the war. Thirdly, if subsequent parliaments did not support those great. mountains of promifes, as they are called, which this parliament raised, we shall venture to affirm that it was the fault of the court, not of the parliaments.

THIS last article requires to be fet in a very clear light, because it opens to us a source of causes, from whence a great part of the mischiefs, which followed in the next reign, arose; or by which, at least, they were aggravated and precipitated. ---First, therefore, we observe that the measures of the court were fo foolifhly taken for pushing the war, that if parliaments had given by millions, and given with as little flint in those days, as they have given fince, their grants must have been ineffectual to any good purpole. Just before the death of king JAMES, an army had been raifed for the Palatinate war, under the command of the famous MANSFELDT. The French first and the Dutch afterwards refused passage to these: troops, or even to fuffer them to land. The cry of the court: was loud against the perfidy of France, as it had been against the emperor and Spain in their turns. This will be always the cafe, when filly ministers bungle themfelves into difficulties, of which others make their profit; or when they knavifuly engage a national quarrel for fome private, indirect intereft, and. inflame the people to refent imaginary injuries. But the truth is, that king JAMES had nobody to blame but himfelf, when he took general and ambiguous answers for fufficient engage-ments, and did not see that France would refuse passage to: these troops for the same reasons as made her decline entering, at that time, into a league against the house of Austria.

ANOTHER blunder committed about the fame time, by this wife king, and that wife minifter, his fcholar, BUCKING-HAM, muft be mentioned. He was to take pofferfion of Frankendal, which had been deposited in the hands of the infanta IsABELLA. The infanta agreed to yield the place to him, and to give paffage to his troops, who were to compose the garrifon, according to her engagements; but refufed to answer for their paffage over the lands of the empire, to which the was was not engaged. Then, and not till then, he made this difcovery in geography, that his troops must march over the lands of the empire to get from the Low Countries into the Palati-Such blunders as thefe were fufficient to difgust the nate. parliaments of that age, and to make them backward in fupplying a war thus managed. Much more reafon had they to be fo, when they faw the fame managers and the fame management continue in the next reign. This difgust at the management of the war, however, would not have produced fo many fatal confequences, if it had flood alone. But we observe, in the second place, that the parliaments, which met after the acceffion of king CHARLES, became incenfed, as they discovered more and more that the account given by the duke of BUCKINGHAM, in the reign of king JAMES, and on which the refolutions of that parliament had been taken, was false in almost every point. A fystem of lies dreffed up to deceive the nation, and imposed on the parliament, could neither remain undifcovered, nor escape the refentment and indignation it deferved, when discovered. Besides, that parliament and the nation too, when they expressed fo much joy at the breach with Spain, flattered themfelves that, by preventing the marriage with the infanta, they had prevented all the dangers, which they apprehended from that marriage; whereas it appeared foon afterwards that they flood exposed to the very fame dangers by the marriage concluded with France; nay, to greater; fince the education of the children by the mother, that is in popery, had been confined to ten years by the former treaty, and was extended to thirteen by the latter. In short, it cannot be denied, and my lord CLARENDON owns, that as the infolence of BUCKINGHAM cauled the war with Spain, fo his luft and his vanity alone threw the nation into another with France. Spain was courted first without reason, and affronted afterwards without provocation. Ships were lent to the Uuu 2 king king of France against his protestant subjects; and the perfecution of his protestant subjects was made the pretence of a rupture with him. Thus was the nation led from one extravagant project to another, at an immense charge, with great diminution of honor and infinite loss to trade, by the ignorance, private interest, and passion of one man. The conduct therefore of the parliament, who attacked this man, was perfectly confiftent with the conduct of that parliament, who had fo much applauded him; and one cannot observe without aftonishment the slip made by the noble historian we have just quoted, when he affirms that the fame men who had applauded him, attacked him, without imputing the leaft crime to him, that was not as much known when they applauded him, as when they attacked him. Now it is plain that many of the crimes imputed to him, in the reign of king CHARLES, when he was attacked, could not be known, and that many others had not been even committed in the reign of king JAMES, when he was, upon one fingle occafion, applauded.

To the difgufts taken at the management of foreign affairs, muft be added those which were daily given by the court in the management of domeftic affairs. Real, not imaginary, grievances arose and were continued in every part of the administration. Some of these king CHARLES, like his father, was obstinately bent to maintain, and his right of imposing them was afferted. Others were difguised and excused rather than defended; but in redrefsing even these, he shewed such a reluctance, that he complied without obliging, and increased the difguft of his people, even whils he granted their requests. We have faid in a former discourse, that king CHARLES came a party man to the throne, and that he continued an invasion on the people's rights, whils he imagined himself only concerned in the defence of his own. In advancing this propofition, fition, we were far from meaning a compliment at the expence of truth. We avow it as an opinion we have formed on reading the relations published on all fides, and to which, it feems to us, that all the authentic anecdotes of those times may be reconciled. This prince had fucked in with his milk those absurd principles of government, which his father was fo industrious and, unhappily for king and people, fo fuccessful in propagating. He found them espoused, as true principles both of religion and policy, by a whole party in the nation, whom he effeemed friends to the conftitution in church and state. He found them opposed by a party, whom he looked on indifcriminately as enemies to the church and to monarchy. Can we wonder that he grew zealous in a caufe, which he underftood to concern him fo nearly, and in which he faw fo many men, who had not the fame interest, and might therefore be fuppofed to act on a principle of confcience, equally zealous ? Let any one, who hath been deeply and long engaged in the contests of party, ask himself on cool reflection, whether prejudices concerning men and things, have not grown up and strengthened with him, and obtained an uncontroulable influence over his conduct. We dare appeal to the inward fentiments of every fuch perfon .--- With this habitual biafs upon him king CHARLES came to the throne; and, to complete the misfortune, he had given all his confidence to a mad man. An honeft minister might have shewn him how wrong his measures were ; a wife one how ill-timed. Buck-INGHAM was incapable of either. The violence and haughtinefs of his temper confirmed his mafter in the purfuit of thefe measures; and the character of the first minister became that of the administration. Other circumstances, which often happen, happened likewife in this cafe. The minister was univerfally hated; the king was not. To support the minister, it was:

was neceffary that the prerogative should be strained, and violent and unpopular means should be employed. To support the government, nothing of this fort was neceffary. Nay, the very contrary measures were necessary to reconcile the king to his people, and to ftop in time that alienation of their minds from him; which began even then to appear. In this difference of interests, those of the crown were facrificed to those of the minister. King CHARLES, who had encouraged parliamentary profecutions, in his father's reign, would not fuffer them in his own. He diffolved his parliaments, and broke almost all the few ties of union, which remained between himfelf and the nation, that he might fcreen fome of the most unworthy men who ever differved a prince, or difhonored a court .--- Before the death of BUCKINGHAM, irreparable mifchief was done. " The diftemper of the nation was fo uni-" verfal," according to my lord CLARENDON, " that all wife " men looked upon it as the prediction of the deftruction and " diffolution that would follow." This prediction was foon verified. The king executed what he had often threatened. Parliaments were laid aside. The very mention of them was forbid; and he continued to govern without any for twelve years. During this interval, the diftemper lurked indeed; but it grew more malignant; and if a national ferenity appeared about the time when the king went into Scotland, it appeared just when the poifon worked most effectually and began to feize the heart. Jealoufies about religion and liberty were now at their height. The former, as far as they affected the king and his protestant ministers, were ill-founded; but for that very reafon, it would have been eafy to cure them; and if they had been cured in time, as we think, on my lord CLA-RENDON's authority, that nothing could have led the Scotch nation into rebellion, fo are we perfuaded that a great motive and and fpur to the rebellion in England would have been taken away. The latter were certainly but too well founded. The king had, in a manner, renounced the conflitution; and inflead of governing with the affiftance and concurrence of a parliament, he governed by illegal acts of power, which the council, the ftar-chamber and the high commiffion exercifed. ----There was fomething ftill more dangerous to liberty in practice. Not only the government was carried on without law, or againft law, but the judges were become the inftruments of arbitrary power, and that law, which fhould have been the protection of property, was rendered, by their corrupt interpretations of it, fo great a grievance that " the foundations of " right were, to the apprehenfion and underftanding of wife " men," fays my lord CLARENDON, " never more in danger " to be deftroyed."

WHILST things were in this fituation here, king CHARLES. lighted up another fire in Scotland, by refuming the project of modelling that church, which king JAMES had begun. Archbishop LAUD, who had neither temper nor knowledge of the world enough to be intrusted with the government of a private college, conducted this enterprize and precipitated the public ruin. The puritans of England foon united in a common caufe with the puritans of Scotland; and the army, which the latter had raifed, marched into England. Many of those who had appeared against the court, and even some of those who were on the fide of the court, favored, in different manners, the Scots, and hoped to apply this force and to improve this incident fo as to reftrain the prerogative within known, perhaps narrower bounds, and to ftrengthen the barriers of public liberty .--- That this might have been brought about, and that the civil war which followed, might have been prevented.

prevented, appeared very manifeftly in the temper and proceedings of the parliament, which met in April 1640, when all had been done, which could be done, to deftroy the conflitution; for if the king had been able to continue to govern without parliaments, the conftitution had been deftroyed; and when calling a parliament was visibly the effect of neceflity and fear, not choice, the parliament, which was called, fhewed wonderful order and fobriety in their whole behavior. If fome passion had appeared in their debates, it might have been well excufed in an houfe of commons affembled at fuch a time; and yet fcarce an angry word was thrown out. The few, that escaped from some, were either filently difliked, or openly difapproved. The king, even in this crifis of affairs, preferved the fame carriage he had formerly used towards them, and shewed too plainly that he regarded them only as tax-layers. In a word, about a month after their meeting, he diffolved them, and as foon as he had diffolved them, he repented, but he repented too late, of his rashness. Well might he repent; for the vessel was now full, and this last drop made the waters of bitterness overflow .----Here we draw the curtain, and put an end to our remarks, by obferving, first, that if the spirit of liberty had once relaxed in the space of almost forty years, liberty must have been fwallowed up by prerogative; fecondly, that after thefe long contefts between the king and the people, and when the latter had received the utmost provocations, the spirit of liberty was not transported into any excess; determined to defend the people, but unwilling to offend the king. The king, and he alone could have done it, forced the affairs of the nation, as he had put his own long before, into the hands of a faction. The true friends of the conflitution were divided; and divided, were too weak to prevail on either fide. The fpirit of of faction, not the fpirit of liberty, is anfwerable for all which followed; and who is anfwerable for reducing the conteft on both fides, to be the conteft of faction may, we think, be fufficiently collected from what hath been faid in thefe difcourfes.

SIR,

SINCE you have gone through the tafk, which you undertook at my defire, and have carried your remarks on the hiftory of England, as far as you judge them neceffary at this time, I think myfelf obliged to return you thanks for your trouble, and to fay fomething to you, concerning the clamor raifed and the conduct held upon this occafion, by thofe, who, not content with the merit of being your adverfaries, have declared themfelves fuch at laft to the very being of the Britifh conftitution, and to the principles on which the prefent eftablifhment is built, and on which alone it can ftand fecure.

BEFORE I left the town, nay as foon as my firft letter to you appeared, the whole posse of ministerial fcribblers was fummoned. Their numbers were augmented; perhaps their pensions. Their strength, indeed, continued much the fame; but their fury redoubled. At my return to London, I am informed that these weekly swarms have continued to buz about ever fince; that the infects have been dispersed by every flap of your pen; but, that, like true infects, they have still gathered again and renewed their din.---I fay, that I am informed of this; because, among other circumstances, which compose the ease and quiet of a country life, we are fure of not being infested there by these mighty swarms of little creatures. As their lives are short, the extent in which they ramble, is narrow, and few of them take their flight beyond the bills of mortality.

THE manner in which thefe writers have fupported the difpute between you and them, and the explanations to which they have been pufhed, confirm all the fufpicions which it was natural to entertain, when fo great an alarm was taken at the firft direct avowal of an attempt to revive the fpirit of liberty, and to recall to the minds of men the true notions of the Britifh conflitution. They were fo earneft to difcourage the profecution of fuch a defign; they were fo eager to find fault, where fo little fault was to be found, that they catched at every word, in which they imagined the leaft flip had been made, tho' the fubject would not have been affected, nor the merits of the caufe have been altered, if thefe flips had been real, and had proceeded from my ignorance, as the objections proceeded from theirs.

I should not fo much as mention this, if it was not neceffary to fhew that your real crime, as well as mine, towards the perfons, who encourage and direct these authors, is our ftarting the fubject, not our manner of treating it. Their anger appeared, the clamor of their party was raifed, and all the powers of fcurrility and calumny were called forth to their aid, before any of those pretences were found out, which they afterwards fo meanly and fo immorally employed against us. To prove this beyond the contradiction of any man of fenfe and candor, it will be only neceffary to appeal to the whole scope of my first letters to you, which raifed the ftorm; for what do those letters contain besides general and inoffensive reflections on the nature of liberty and of faction, and on the neceffity of keeping the fpirit of liberty alive and active, even in times of apparent fecurity? Your writings were juftified, indeed, in thefe letters; but fo they had been in others, and on many precedent occasions. The charge of Jacobitism was refuted, indeed, with the contempt it deferved, and factious X X X 2 defigns defigns of another kind were pointed out; but factious defigns had been imputed to the fame perfons before and upon the fame grounds. It remains then that this new alarm was taken, as I just now faid, at the general defign of those papers; and if that was fufficient to give fuch an alarm, fure I am that you are more than justified for all you writ before this dispute begun, and for all you have published in the course of it.

THE old gentleman, who defended you in the former letters, thought you deferved the acknowledgments of every honeft man for attempting to revive this fpirit, even fuppofing you to have no other reason than your observation that a contrary temper prevailed. How much is this reafon inforced, how much more do you deferve the acknowledgments of every honeft man, if it is become evident not only that a fupine temper, contrary to the activity of this fpirit had prevailed; but that a contrary fpirit hath been raifed, and that principles, deftructive of all liberty, and particularly adapted to deftroy that of the British government, are avowed, taught and propagated ? If I pronounced too haftily, in my fecond letter, that the mask was pulled off, furely we may now fay, upon knowledge, not belief, that the mask is fallen off from your adverfaries in the fcuffle. I shall not repeat what is faid in your difcourfes, nor add any thing to them. You have there quoted the doctrines of flavery. You have flewed the direct and indirect tendency of them all; and you have remarked that fome of them have been taught even by those who have in the fame breath admitted the confequences of them. Nothing lefs therefore than a conftant and vigorous opposition, of which you have fet us the example, will be able to ftop the progress of those pernicious doctrines. The principles which king JAMES the first established, were not more absurd than Their tendency was more obvious; but, for that reathefe. fon, 7

fon, they were less dangerous. If those principles prevailed very far by time and encouragement, and had like to have prevailed farther; why should not these have the same, or greater fuccefs? It may be faid, perhaps, that the authority of the crown helped the progress of the former, which is not our prefent case. To this diffunction I shall submit very rea-dily; but if these principles have gained fome ground already; and that they have gained fome cannot be denied, without this authority to inforce them; is there not reason to fear that they may gain more, and is not every degree they gain a degree more of danger to this constitution of government? Surely, fir, there can remain no doubt in the breaft of any man, who hath given the least attention to the disputes between you and your adverfaries, whether they or you are on the fide of liberty; and therefore it is an aggravation of their guilt, that they have endeavored to make your writings pass for an oppofition to the prefent happy establishment, and their cause for that of the crown. You and I have fufficiently declared ourfelves, and answered them, on the first head. If they had been able to produce an inftance, where, departing from your fubject, you had given occasion to draw any odious parallel, the intention of drawing fuch a parallel might, with fome color, have been imputed to you; but fince they have not been able to do this, and have been defied to do it, the reproach and infamy of making fuch parallels, as well as the fcandalous immorality of imputing them to others, must lie at their door .--- Let us fee how well their pretenfions are fupported on the fecond head, and whether we cannot prove, without any forced conftructions of their words, or arbitrary interpretations of their meaning, that the open and fecret abettors of these writers are either enemies of the present establishment, or have fome private interest more at heart than the true intereft of this establishment.

THIS establishment is founded on the principles of liberty; on the very principles you have maintained. It was made by the people of Great Britain, to fecure the pofferfion of their liberty, as well as their religion. Had contrary principles prevailed; either those which tend to fubvert the constitution, by raifing prerogative, and which were justly objected to fome of the tories formerly; or those which tend to fubvert it, by undermining liberty, and which are as justly objected to fome of the whigs now; this establishment could never have been made. Who are enemies and who are friends therefore to public liberty and to the prefent establishment? Are you their enemy, who defend not only the general principles of liberty, but the particular principles and the particular ends, on which and for which this eftablishment was made? Are your adverfaries friends to either, when they only feem to admit fome general notions of liberty, that they may promote with greater effect, on particular occasions, the doctrines of flavery; and when they endeavor to deftroy the principles and to defeat the ends of the prefent establishment? The revolution and the acts of fettlement have fecured us against the dangers which were formerly apprehended from prerogative. To what purpose are measures and principles of policy daily pleaded for, which would expose us to greater dangers than these? Why are such inceffant pains taken to fhew by what means liberty may be undermined and our conftitution destroyed even now, after all we have done and all we have fuffered to fecure one, and to improve the other ? I shall not give particular answers to these queftions; nor offer to affign the private interest, which the perfons, who are guilty of this, may have at heart; for I will, upon no occafion, even feem to follow the example of your adverfaries; nor prefume to deliver my fuspicions; tho' real and well-grounded, as the intentions of other men. This alone I will repeat; that they who argue and hire others to argue argue in this manner, do in fact promote fome intereft, which is repugnant to the ends for which the people of this nation eftablished the protestant fuccession and the present fettlement of the crown. They have not yet attacked the religion, but they manifestly attack the liberty of their country; and as much as these two are interwoven together, tho' it be true that whenever our religion is in danger, our civil liberty must be fo likewise; yet it is as true that religion may be fafe and civil liberty in danger.

I HAVE nothing more to add upon this head, before I proceed to that which shall conclude my letter, except my defires that you will perfift, and my hopes that you will fucceed in the caufe you have undertaken; the caufe of your country, the caufe of truth and of liberty. The means you employ are those of argument and perfuasion; the lawful, and the fole lawful means, which can be employed to rouze an indolent, to inform a deceived, to reclaim a corrupt, or to reconcile a divided people. Let the factious continue to affert, as they have had already the impudence and the folly to do, in one of their ministerial pamphlets, that the faults they are pleafed to afcribe to the people of Great Britain * render an army neceffary. Inftead of endeavoring to perfuade and to win, let them endeavor to force and corrupt their countrymen. The fpirit of liberty abhors fuch means, and the caufe of liberty would be difhonored by them. If this nation was as corrupt and depraved as it is faid to be by those who do their utmost to corrupt and deprave it; if our country was in that declining state, and the freedom of our government as near it's period as they affirm, there would remain no part for any honeft man to take, except that of fitting filently down and perifhing in the common fhipwreck : but furely this is not yet our cafe, unlefs we are induced to believe it fo; unlefs we make our ruin irretrievable by ftruggling no longer againft it. There are men, many, we think, who have not bowed the knee to BAAL, nor worfhipped the brazen image. We may therefore hope that there is ftill a bleffing in flore for us. In all events, Mr. D'ANVERS, you are fure of one advantage, which no violence, no injuffice can take from you; the inward fatisfaction of having ferved your country, to the utmoft of your power, by those lawful means which the conftitution of it's government allows, and by no others.

IF I hear in that retreat, to which age, the circumflances of fortune, and, above all, the temper of my mind determine me, that you fucceed, I shall rejoice in the common joy. If I hear that you fail, my concern for you will be lost in the common calamity.

THE article with which I propofe to conclude my letter, is of fuch a nature that I cannot omit it, on this occasion, with any regard to truth, justice, honor, and the fentiments of a most reasonable indignation. The writers, who are employed against you, have received, with an unlimited commission to rail, particular instructions to direct their Billingsgate chiefly at two gentlemen. The art of blackening characters, by private clofet-whifpers, hath been always practifed, when power and confidence have been given to the infolent and the bafe. Perhaps it may have been thought proper, at this time, to confirm the effect of fuch infinuations by an echo from the prefs; and to prevent a general national clamor from founding in fome ears, by raifing an artificial clamor round about them : but whatever the defign may have been, fure I am that this strain of malice could not have been employed against men, who who value it lefs, or who hold in greater contempt both the contrivance and the contrivers. This they may do, becaufe they are falfely and malicioufly accufed; but he, who is the object of a juft clamor and of national hatred, and who cannot turn his eyes on himfelf, without confeffing to himfelf that he is a principal caufe of the grievances of his country, muft tremble at a clamor which he knows ought, and which he hath reafon to fear will, fooner or later, prevail againft him.

THE calumny against one of the gentlemen, mentioned above, is confined to two heads; that he hath left his friends and party, and that he is urged to oppose the minister by the ftings of difappointed ambition. How ridiculous is the charge, and on whom can fuch ftuff impose? Hath he changed his notions of right and wrong in matters of government? Hath he renounced the principles of good policy, which he formerly professed ? His greatest enemy is defied to shew that he hath ; and yet, unless this can be shewn, nothing can be more impertinent, or more filly, than the imputation of leaving his friends and party. If he purfues the fame general principles of conduct, with which he first fet out, and is in opposition now to fome few of those, with whom he concurred then, they have left him, becaufe they have left the principles they professed. He left neither. For instance, he inveighs against public profusion and private corruption. He combats both with a conftant inflexibility, which might have done honor to a Roman citizen, in the best times of that commonwealth. Hath he left his friends in doing this? No; they who oppose him in it, have left both him and virtue; and fuch men, tho' they have fometimes had the honor to concur with him, could never be his friends.

Is

Is the latter part of the charge better founded? Is it not a manifest begging of the question, and a begging of it on the least probable fide ? He affisted a minister to rife to power. He opposes this minister in power. Ergo, Spight and refentment are his motives. May not the abufe, which he apprehends this minister makes of his power, may not measures, which he fears are wicked, knows are weak, and fees obstinately purfued, be his motives? May not dangerous ambition, infatiable avarice and infolent behavior be his provocations? May not this gentleman think himfelf the more obliged to contribute to this minister's fall, for having contributed fo much to his elevation ? Let me alk farther, whom we shall soonest fuspect to have been actuated by fentiments of private intereft? the perfon accused, or his accuser? Whose circumstances most demanded, whole family most required an increase of wealth and fortune; those of the accused, or those of the accuser? Who hath given greater proofs of avarice to gather, and profufion to fquander; the accufed, or the accufer ? In whom have we feen stronger evidences of that vindictive temper, which prompts to perfonal fpight and refentment; in the accufed or the accufer ?--- If we may form any judgment of the gentleman accused, there is not the least color of reason to suppose that his opposition proceeds from a spirit of ambition, or a defign of puffing himfelf into the administration. He hath already poffeffed two very confiderable employments in the ftate; one of which he voluntarily laid down, as by his conduct in parliament, against fome measures of the court, he forced the ministers to take the other way, having behaved with unspoted integrity in both; and if I am rightly informed of his refolution by those who feem to know him very well, it will hardly be ever in the power of the greatest man in England, or of the best friend he has in the world, to perfuade him to accept of a third.---There is an ambition, with which thefe fpreaders 5

fpreaders of calumny and their mafters are intirely unacquainted; the ambition of doing good and the receiving the reward in fame. He, who hath this ambition, can never be difappointed in the other; and if any man, in our age and country, hath reafon to be fatisfied with his fuccefs in the purfuit of this ambition, it is the gentleman of whom we fpeak.

WHENEVER the defamation, which hath been difplayed against the other gentleman is examined with the least knowledge of facts, or the leaft impartiality of judgment, it will appear equally falfe, and perhaps still more scandalous; for, in this cafe, the flanderers take an ungenerous and mean advantage, which they have not in the other; the advantage, which his fingular fituation gives them. They, who would have declined a contest with him, whilst he was in a condition to answer for himself, have not blushed to declaim against him in another condition. They have experienced, in his cafe, that the unfortunate are not friendlefs. They may live, perhaps, to experience, in their own, that the guilty are fo.---Another advantage, which these flanderers take against this gentleman, arifes from the various scenes of life, through which he hath paffed; fome diftant in place; fome fecret in their nature. Here calumny hath more room to affert, and innocence lefs opportunity to defend. Common honefty, in fome cafes, and even decency, in others, fhut the mouth of the man who carries these qualities about him; and even more in his own cause than in that of another person; but calumny is fubject to none of these controuls; and we speak on our own knowledge, when we affirm that, in the prefent cafe, the falfe imputations, which the accufers bring, are fcreened from abfolute detection by nothing but the honor of the accufed.

LET us take notice of fome of the crimes, (for crimes and heinous crimes they would be, if the facts were, in any degree, true) which are laid to the charge of this gentleman.

His ingratitude and treachery to the late duke of MARLEO-ROUGH and the earl of GODOLPHIN stand first in the roll. I believe no man acknowledges more fincerely than he the fuperior merit of these two illustrious men, or wishes more ardently that they were now alive, and had the conduct of the affairs of Great Britain; but I know no obligation of gratitude or honor, which he lay under to continue in their administration, when the measures of it were altered. They might have reasons, perhaps good reasons, for altering their measures. He could have none in point of honor, whatever he might have had in point of interest, for complying with that alteration. Some of the enemies of this gentleman came into the world on fuch a foot, that they might think it preferment to be the creatures of any men in power. He who came into it upon another foot, was the friend, but not the creature of thefe great men; and he hath had the fatisfaction of proving himfelf fuch on different occasions and without oftentation, at least to one of them, at a time, when the creatures of great men ufually renounce them; at a time, when they could do him neither good nor hurt. That he came to court, on the call of the late queen, in oppofition to them, and exerted himfelf in her fervice, when they ferved her no longer, will not be objected to him by any man, who thinks more allegiance due to the prince than to the minister. If the present minister hath a mind to avow a contrary doctrine, he hath my confent; but then let those who engage with him, remember on what terms they engage.----On the fame falfe principle is another accusation brought. This gentleman had no patron, or patronefs, but the late queen. He neither projected, nor procured the difgrace of her laft minifter, nor knew that it was refolved, whatever he might fulpect, till he heard from herfelf that it was fo. Much more might be faid on this article; but we chufe to pafs it over for many reafons, and, among others, for this; that whilft we defend the living, we are unwilling to fay any thing which might be drawn by thefe flanderers into an infult on the dead.

THE laft charge of ingratitude, brought againft this gentleman, is hard to be answered feriously. Thus much however shall be faid truly and feriously. He acknowledges, with the deepest fense of gratitude possible, the elemency and goodness of his late majesty; but fure he hath reason, if ever man had reason, to disclaim all obligation to the minister. The mercy of the late king was extended to him unasked and unearned. What followed many years afterwards, in part of his majesty's gracious intentions, was due folely to the king. That they were not fulfilled, was due folely to the minister. His ambition, his causeless jealous and private interest continued a fort of profeription, with much cruelty to the person concerned, and little regard to the declarations which his royal master had been pleased for frequently to make.

THAT this gentleman was engaged in the caufe of the pretender, is true. That he ferved him unfaithfully, is falfe. He never entered into thefe engagements, or any commerce with him, till he had been attainted, and cut off from the body of his majefty's fubjects. He never had any commerce, either direct or indirect, which was inconfistent with thefe engagements, whilft he continued in them; and fince he was out of them, he hath had no commerce, either direct or indirect, in favor of that caufe. On fuch an occasion as this it is decent, not not arrogant to challenge all mankind. I do it therefore, in the behalf of this gentleman, to produce one fingle proof, in contradiction of any one of thefe general affirmations. For the truth of fome, I may appeal even to thofe, who have been in the fervice of his late, and are in that of his prefent majefty; and particularly to a noble lord *, who by the poft he was in, when most of thefe transactions passed, must have had the best opportunities of knowing the truth of them, and by whofe testimony I am willing that the gentleman I defend should ftand or fall; a decision to which, I am fure, he will himfelf be ready to fubmit his life, and, what is more, his honor.

I MAKE you no excufe for the length of my letter. The juffice I have done, or endeavored to do, to those, who have been vilely calumniated, and particularly on the occasion of your writings and of mine, will be a fufficient excuse of itself.

REMARKS, &c.

T is impoffible to have read the papers, which have been published against the writings of the Craftsman, and not have observed that one principal point hath been labored with conftant application, and fometimes with a little art. The point I mean hath been this; to make all the difputes about national affairs, and our most important interests, to pass for nothing more than cavils, which have been raifed by the pique and refentment of one man, and by the iniquity and dangerous defigns of another. Nothing, which could be faid or done to inculcate this belief, hath been neglected. The fame charges have been repeated almost every week, and the public hath been modeftly defired to pay no regard to undeniable facts, to unanfwered and unanfwerable arguments, becaufe thefe facts and thefe arguments were fuppofed, by the ministerial writers, to come from men, to whom these hirelings afcribed, against all probability, the worst motives, and whole characters they endeavored to blacken without proof. Surely this proceeding rendered it neceffary, at leaft not im-Zzz VOL. L. proper, proper, at the end of those remarks, which were to conclude the collection of the Craftsman, to fay something concerning the perfons, who had been fo particularly attacked on account of the part which they, who railed at them, were pleafed to fuppose that these gentlemen had in the writings contained in that collection. This, I fay, was neceffary ; at least proper; not in order to raife a fpirit, as it is impertinently fuggested in the libel which lies before me; but to refute calumny, and to remove at least fome of those prejudices, which · had been raifed, or renewed, on the occasion of these writings, and which were employed to weaken the effect of them; an effect, which may be faid with truth to have been aimed at the noble pair of brothers; fince it keeps up a national spirit of enquiry and watchfulnefs, which it is the intereft of thefe perfons, as it hath been their endeavor, to ftifle; and which it is the interest of every other man in Britain to preferve in himfelf, and to nourish in others; an effect, which cannot be faid, without the greatest untruth, to have been aimed against the present settlement; fince the highest infolence, which can be offered to his majefty, is to attempt to blend his interest and his cause with those of his unworthy fervants, as the tools of these unworthy fervants are every day employed to do, and probably at his majefty's expence.

SOMETHING was faid therefore by the Craftfman, in his journal of the twenty-fecond of May, to the purpofe I have mentioned. If he went out of his way, (for he ought moft certainly to confine himfelf to things, and meddle with perfons as little as poffible) he went out of it on great provocation. He carried truth and reafon along with him; and he ufed a moderation and a decency, to which his adverfaries are ftrangers.

To fet this matter in a full light, let us confider what he faid; let us confider how he hath been answered; and, by fairly comparing both, let us put the whole merits of this caufe upon one short but decisive isfue. It will be time afterwards to make a few observations on the clamor raifed; on the reasons and defigns of it; in a word, to detect the mean artifice and filly expedients, to which the two honorable patrons of the remarker are reduced. In doing this, I fhall neither affect to declaim, nor to inveigh, tho' I have before me an inexhaustible fund of matter for both, and the law of retaliation to bear me out. As I am perfuaded the men I have to do with, can raife no passion in the person concerned, fo have I no need of endeavoring to raife the paffions of others .--- But to proceed.

THE Craftsman took notice of those accusations which are brought against the gentleman he mentions in the second place. --- I meddle not with the defence of the other, which hath been undertaken by an abler pen.---Some of thefe he answered in general only; and yet he answered them as particularly as he ought to have done for reafons of honor, which are touched upon by him, and which shall be a little more opened by me.

But there were other points, not at all affected by thefe reafons, on which no explanation was neceffary to be given by the accufed, and on which the Craftiman had a right to demand proofs from the accufers. They were points of a more determined nature; fuch as admitted of no different conftructions; fuch as could not be altered by circumstances. They were of a more public nature; fuch as the men, who brought the accusations, must have it in their power to prove, if they were true; and fuch therefore as must be false, if ZZZ 2

ON these the Craftsman infifted. He affirmed propositions directly contrary to the accusations brought. He appealed to unquestionable authority for the truth of what he affirmed; and to one in particular, which should have been treated with more respect by the remarker, fince it will outweigh, at home and abroad, a thousand such authorities as those of his patrons. He challenged all mankind to produce one fingle proof, in contradiction of any one of the general affirmations.

Was there any thing unfair, or indecent in this proceeding? Was there any thing in it, which could provoke the choler of thofe, who are friends to truth and juffice? If they, who brought thefe accufations, had been fuch, an opportunity was prefented to them of convicting the guilty man at the very tribunal before which his caufe had been pleaded. By producing proof on thefe heads, they had it in their power to condemn him upon all the reft; and if this part of the charge was made good, the opinion of mankind would have been fairly enough decided as to the other.

Issue being joined therefore in this manner, the accufed perfon must be found guilty of all the crimes laid to his charge; or his accufers must be found guilty of flander, of calumny, and of the worst fort of affaffination.

I PASS over the many fourrilous productions of those weekly ministerial foolds, who are hired to call names, and are capable pable of little more. The elaborate libel, intitled "Remarks "on the Craftfman's vindication," feems to be the utmost effort of their and their patron's collected flrength; and tho' I have waited feveral days to fee if they had any more feandal to throw out, yet I never doubted an inftant from what quarter this remarkable piece came into the world.

THE whole pamphlet is one continued invective, and deferves no more to be called Remarks on the Craftfman, or an anfwer to him, than the railing and raving and throwing of filth by a madman deferve to be called an anfwer to thofe who unwarily pafs too near his cell. All that malice could ever invent, or the credulity of parties, inflamed by oppofition, receive, is affembled. Truth is difguifed by mifreprefentation, and even many things which the noble pair know to be falfe, are affirmed as true.

BUT you will afk, perhaps, whether the challenge is not accepted, and whether proofs are not brought to contradict the plain and politive affirmations made by the Craftsman? I answer, the challenge is accepted, and the remarker affures us that he hath brought proof in numerous inflances against these affirmations; which is the more generous, because the Craftsman exacted but one fingle proof in contradiction of any of them.

THE first of these affirmations was, that the gentleman concerned never entered into engagements, or any commerce with the pretender, till he had been attainted and cut off from the body of his majesty's subjects.---Let us examine the facts, which we find scattered up and down in the remarks, which may be applied to prove, in opposition to this affirmation, what hath been so often afferted, that this gentleman tleman was a zealous jacobite and an agent of the pretender, even in the reign of the late queen.

HAD the libeller proved this high treafon, I might agree that the gentleman's leaving his country was a confequence; but I can never admit that it is a proof of his guilt. Could no other reason for leaving his country be given, except his guilt, his leaving his country would be a strong prefumption against him. But many other reasons will foon occur to those who remember the passages of that time; and reasons there are of a more private nature still, which would be very far, to fay no more, from reflecting difhonor on a ftep, which is called, by these foul-mouthed advocates of power, shameful and ignominious. One thing it may be proper to affure them of, that they may pretend to mistake the Craftfman, and to mifapply his words no more. It is this. The gentleman never declined a contest with the two honorable patrons of this libel. One of them was, in those days, below his notice; and he never found, upon trial, that he had reafon to apprehend being foiled by the other. But we must not yet difmiss this article.

IF the proof we are examining proved any thing, it would prove too much. If to decline, in certain circumftances, a trial; if to go into voluntary exile, either before a trial, or even after condemnation, were abfolute proofs of guilt, the conduct of many greater and better men than the perfon now accufed would deferve our cenfure, and that of calumniators, as vile as thefe libellers, would merit our approbation. ME-TELLUS TELLUS and RUTILIUS must be condemned. APULEIUS and APICIUS must be justified.

This fort of proof therefore not appearing fufficient to make good the charge, that this gentleman was engaged with the pretender before his attainder, great pains are taken, and much rhetoric is employed to fhew, what we fhall not prefume to contradict, that he ought not to have engaged in that cause after his attainder. Neither did the Craftfman infift on this circumftance as a defence of the perfon accufed. He fixed this date of the engagements mentioned, in contradiction to those who had falfely affirmed that thefe engagements were much more antient. But he neither urged it as a defence, nor pleaded it as an excufe; and yet I am perfuaded that this very circumftance had fome weight with his late majefty, when that excellent prince, the mildness of whose temper, and the clemency of whofe nature, would have rendered him amiable in the most private station, and made him almost adorable in that great elevation, to which the providence of GoD had raifed him; when that excellent prince, I fay, was pleafed, on his own motion, and without any application from the perfon here spoken of, to extend his present, and promise his future favor to him.

THO' the Craftsman did neither fay nor intend what has been objected by the remarker to him, yet he might perhaps mean fomething more than hath been observed; and if he did mean it, he meant to inculcate upon this occasion, a very useful, general truth. Let us grant that the man, who engages against his country, even when he has been oppressed in it, or driven out of it by violence, is not to be defended; that these are occasions, wherein we ought to kiss the rod, which feourges us, and reverence that authority, which we think think has been unjuftly exercifed against us. But then let it be granted likewife, that human paffions are fo ftrong, and human reason so weak, that men, who fuffer perfecution or who imagine they fuffer it, are feldom able to keep within these bounds of heroical moderation. They will be apt to feize the opportunities which may be offered, of refifting, or of attempting to repair the injuries done them. They will flatter themfelves, that they do not vow their revenge against the people, the innocent and collective body of their countrymen, nor go about to fubvert the conftitution of the government. They will perfuade others, nay they will perfuade themfelves, that they do not feek revenge, but redrefs; nor aim to deftroy the law, which punifhes, but to prevent the abufe of it, which perfecutes. Thus will men, who actually fuffer, be apt to reason; and if the case be common to numbers, they will be apt to proceed from reafoning on fuch principles, to act upon them. Wife governments therefore have been careful to diffinguish between punishment and perfecution ; have never fuffered the former, however just, necessary, or fevere, to carry the least appearance of the latter. Lud-LOW was justly punished. My lord CLARENDON, whom the remarker hath fo ftrangely yoaked with the regicide, was unjuftly, ungratefully and cruelly perfecuted. We may pronounce, without uncharitablenefs, that the former would have taken any opportunity of fubverting a fecond time the conftitution of his country; not from refentment alone, but from principle. The latter would have been moved by no refentments to difturb that frame of government, which he had contributed fo much to reftore. The former example therefore hath nothing to do in this place; and if I admit the latter, it will only ferve to fhew us how men fhould act, not how they do act. It will be one example of virtue, opposed to innumerable inftances of frailty. Innumerable, indeed, are the inftances 3 ftances of men in all ages, who, having been driven out of their country by violence, have endeavored, even by violence, to return to it. This is the general and known courfe of nature; depraved indeed, but human : and fince it is fo; if we allow that they, who difturb a government, becaufe they think themfelves perfecuted, deferve no excufe, we must allow that those, who give occasion to this difturbance by perfecution, deferve very little.

I HOPE I may deferve fome for this digreffion, into which the remarker led me; and I return to my fubject, by faying that neither the Craftfman hath pretended, nor do I here pretend, to excufe the engagements which this gentleman took, after his attainder, and which his late majefty fo gracioufly pardoned; but that his taking thefe engagements, after his attainder, is no proof that he was under them before; and that his going out of the kingdom, in the late king's reign, is no proof that he was a zealous jacobite, and an agent of the pretender in the late queen's reign.

THE libeller, finding himfelf unable to make this charge good, leffens the charge that he may fuit his proof to it. If he cannot prove that the gentleman was in the interefts of the pretender, before his attainder, he will prove at least that he had a ftrong propension to those interests; and how does he prove even this? He afferts that in the year 1702, this gentleman was " one of the virtuous one hundred and feventeen, who " gave their votes to throw out the bill for fettling the protestant "fucceffion, &c." Falfe and impudent affertion ! A few pages before he pretends to have the journal book of the house of commons before him. Had he it before him now? if he had, how can he affirm, in direct contradiction to it? If he had not, how could he venture to affirm any thing, concerning this matter? The VOL. I. 4 A

The bill for fettling the protestant fuccession, in the prefent royal family, passed the house of commons in the month of May 1701, not in 1702; and it passed nemine contradicente, to bring in a bill " for the farther fecurity of his majefty's " perfon and the fucceffion of the crown in the protestant line, " and extinguishing the hopes of the pretended prince of Wales, " and all other pretenders, and their open and fecret abettors." This bill was accordingly brought in, and the perfons who, by order of the houfe, prepared and brought it in, were fir CHARLES HEDGES and one mr. ST. JOHN. In the progress of this bill through the houfe, it appears that there were fome debates and divisions about particular clauses and amendments ; but the bill was paffed without any division : fo infamoufly falfe is the affertion made by this libeller, that there was no divifion of an hundred and feventeen, or of any other number, for throwing out either the bill which fettled the fucceffion ; or the bill, which was made for the farther fecurity of it. There was a division indeed, of an hundred and seventeen against an hundred and eighteen, upon a claufe added by the lords to a bill for inlarging the time for taking the oath of abjuration, &c. and this happened in the year 1702; but what relation hath this fact to the fact afferted ? Whether the gentleman voted against this claufe, or not, I am unable to fay; and it is to no purpofe to enquire; for the claufe regarded only fuch perfons as had neglected to take the abjuration oath in time, and provided that if fuch perfons had forfeited any office, benefice, &c. to which any other perfons had been preferred, the former should not be restored by taking the advantage. of this act. If this pretended proof is not another inftance of the vileft calumniation, the libeller himfelf confesses that the Craftsman's challenge was properly made; and that there is not one proof in the world against his general affirmations.

ANOTHER fact, which is advanced and most pathetically declaimed upon, for reafons not hard to be difcovered, is likewife applied to maintain the fame charge. "This gentleman," fays the libeller, " had the impudence to oppose his prefent " moft facred majefty, when he demanded a writ of right---" The writ of fummons to parliament. He afterwards caufed " the elector of Hanover's minister to be forbid the court, for " no other crime than having demanded that writ." And did this gentleman oppose this writ? Nay, did any other fervant of the late queen oppofe it ? Falfe and impudent is the affertion. It was ordered to be made out the very day * it was demanded. If the minister, who demanded the writ, was forbid the court, was this gentleman the caufe of it? Is every difagreeable circumstance to be afcribed to him in an affair, which was too important not to be laid, by the proper minifter, that is by the chancellor, not the fecretary, before her late majefty and her council; and in which it may be fuppofed that her majesty's refentments were alone sufficient to determine fuch a refolution? Befides, if the minister received the affront mentioned, was it fingly and abstractedly for demanding the writ; or was it founded on the manner of demanding, and on many other circumstances, fome expressed and fome hinted at in the letters, writ foon afterwards by the late queen to her late electoral highnefs the princefs SOPHIA and to his prefent majefty, which lie before me in the printed annals of queen ANNE's reign ? Was the reception, given by his late majefty, then elector, to the minister, who made this demand, at his return home, fuch a one as shewed his majefty's approbation of this measure, and his disapprobation of what had happened here upon it ?--- I fay no more.

WE have now gone through all I can find in this libel, which feems not fo much as to aim at making good the first head of accufation, on which the Craftsman made his challenge.

ON the fecond head, the Craftsman affirmed that the "fame " gentleman never had any commerce, either direct or indirect, " inconfistent with the engagements he took after his attain-" der, whilft he continued in them." Now this affirmation, instead of being disproved, is evaded. " It is foreign to me," fays the remarker --- Is it fo ?--- Have not all his fcribbling affociates charged this gentleman over and over for being treacherous to the pretender; for being engaged with him; and at the fame time a fpy and a partifan, fuch is the language they use, of the late king? Is not the flat contradiction given to this lie a part of the challenge made by the Craftsman? Hath not this libeller accepted the challenge? Hath he not called it a weak, a foolifh, and a flavifh defence? May he evade it after all his boafting? Is he not bound to make it good in every part, or to own the charge of calumny, which I make on him, on the whole fcribbling crew, and on those who pay them ? What he, or they will own, I neither know nor care. What the public will determine is evident.

ON a third head of accufation against this gentleman, the Craftsman affirmed, that fince he was "out of the engagements " last mentioned, he hath had no commerce, either direct or in-"direct, in favor of that cause." Now, upon this head, tho' the accusation be not given up in terms, yet is it as little maintained, or fupported by proof as the laft. The libeller, indeed, calls the gentleman a leviathan of treason; displays the terrible dangers which would have attended the reinftating him; prefumes to call it a libel on the late king's memory to fay fay that he had fuch intentions; and yet dares not deny that his majefty fignified his having fuch intentions. In fhort, with much bombaft, he makes the panegyric of his patron, for defeating these intentions. I shall not condescend to make one fingle remark on this rapfody of fcurrility and adulation. Such poifon carries it's antidote along with it into the world; and no man will be at a lofs to judge whether public or private motives determined the fervant, in this cafe, to defeat the intentions of the master. Whichever they were, he, who can believe that the gentleman fo often mentioned has upon him any of that obligation, which the Craftsman disclaims for him, deferves to be pitied; and he, who can bring himfelf up to affirm it, deferves to be defpifed. But before I leave this article, it may not be improper, nor unfeafonable to enquire, by what criterion good subjects to his majesty and faithful friends to the prefent establishment are to be diffinguished and known. Are all those to be reputed fuch, who affumed the greatest zeal for the protestant fuccession formerly ?--- This cannot be; for many of the tories have this title; and all, who ever wore that name, are proferibed by the fystem we have advanced .---Are all these to be reputed such, who were alike zealous for the protestant fucceffion, and who have befides made constant profession of the principles of whiggifm ?--- This cannot be neither; fince many fuch as these are daily fligmatized with the reproachful names of malcontents and incendaries; and fince endeavors are used, by false deductions and by arbitrary interpretations, to prove them enemies to the government, and in effect arrant traitors .---- What is this criterion then ? I am able to difcover but one, and it is this; being for, or being against the noble pair of brothers, the two honorable patrons. of the remarker. Without the merit of approving their conduct, no man is to be reputed a faithful subject, or a friend to his country. With this merit, and with that of a blind fubfubmiffion, even they, who have been the most obnoxious, may be received; and they, who have been called enemies to the government as loudly as any others, may be inrolled among it's friends. This practice of endeavoring to confine the interest of the government to as narrow a bottom as that of two ministers, has been of late most audaciously purfued. It has been faid in direct terms * that " if his late " majefty had put the administration into any other hands, " he would have been unjust to those brave men who had " done and fuffered much to ferve him; and that he would " not have deferved to wear the crown, if he had not em-" ployed the men whom he did employ." --- Here, again; there might be room for fome particular reflections, if I was disposed to make them. But I avoid this invidious part as much as my fubject will allow me to do; and fhall therefore content myfelf with defiring thefe bold writers, their infpectors and patrons, to confider what the necessary confequences of fuch politions are. If they dare to affert that his late majefty would have been unjuft; that he would not have deferved to wear the crown, if he had not employed the men he did employ : what might they not affert if his prefent majefty fhould, at any time, think fit, in his great wifdom and goodnefs to his people, to remove fome of those very men, whom his royal father did employ? The affertion is not even extended to party. It would have been still indecent if it had. But it is confined to a certain number of particular men; as if the zeal for the protestant succession in the present royal family had not been directed, as it most certainly was, to the national advantage; but had been intended, as to be fure it was not, for the advantage of particular men, and to perpetuate the administration in a private family. This is fuch language, as I believe was never held before, and as no man would

prefume to hold now, if the encouragement to it did not proceed from those, by whom it should be discountenanced and punished.

THERE is another fact, which I must not omit to take notice of in this place; because, tho' it is not one of those on which the Craftsman made his challenge, yet it hath been positively afferted by him, and half of it at least as positively denied by the remarker.

The Craftsman faid " that the mercy of the late king " was extended to the gentleman we fpeak of, unafked and " unearned." That it was unearned the remarker thinks probable; and in thinking fo he gives the lie to all his fellowfcribblers, who have fo often affirmed the contrary. That it was unafked, he fays, is a downright falfehood. He hath the journal-book of the house of commons before him; and there he finds "that the house was acquainted, by his late ma-" jefty's command, in April 1725, that this gentleman had, " about feven years before, made his humble application and " fubmiffion, &c. which his majefty fo far accepted as to give " encouragement to hope for fome future mark of his majefty's " favor and goodnefs." --- In this he exults ; but here again the effrontery and falfhood which he charges on others, will recoil on himfelf. Who drew this ministerial message I know not; nor how far the stile of it may be necessary, according to the forms usual on such occasions; but the remarker might have known, if he had confulted even his patrons, that his majefty's mercy had been extended to this gentleman two years. before the feven there mentioned ; and that his mercy did not confift in encouragement to hope for fome future mark of his majefty's favor and goodnefs, but in a gracious and abfolute promife of his favor in the full extent, which the circumftances of of that gentleman required. I may be the more bold in affirming this fact, becaufe the noble lord, * who delivered the meffage I quote, is ftill alive, as fome other perfons are, to whom his late majefty was pleafed to own that this meffage had been delivered by his order, and to express his gracious intentions conformably to it. --But to proceed.

IT appears most undeniably, that of the three heads, on which the Craftsman gave, and the remarker accepted the challenge, the remarker hath shewn himself unable to prove the first by any true facts, and hath scandalously attempted to do it by false ones; that he hath given up the second; and that he hath not so much as attempted to prove the third.

LET us ask now, shall men, thus plainly convicted of calumny on accufations brought fo often and charged fo peremptorily by them, expect belief, when they endeavor to defame in any other cafe ? Shall they, who are convicted of accufing falfely in cafes, which are plain in their nature, where no proof can be wanting, and where no pretence can be alledged for not producing it, expect that the public should condemn any man, and especially a man who is under fo many circumstances of difadvantage, peculiar to his fingular and unexampled fituation, becaufe they affirm him guilty in cafes, which are intricate in their nature, and where reasons of honor, of prudence and of decency may all concur to impofe filence? How often have the noble pair defended themfelves, and been defended by others, on this principle; that no man ought to charge another, unlefs he is able and ready to prove the charge? How often have they called for proof on this principle, and triumphed that it was not immediately brought?

Now, altho' this defence may not be fufficient in every cafe, where matters of prefent transaction are concerned, and where the perfons attacked are in actual poffeilion of the greateft power; yet furely it may be thought, with reafon, to be a fufficient defence, when matters long ago transacted, and long ago cenfured too, are concerned ; when the perfons, who attack, are in actual poffession of the greatest power; and the perfon who is attacked, hath none of those offensive, or defensive weapons at his command, which power furnishes in fo abundant a manner. it is constructed in the construction of the

THE remarker thinks that no "reafons of honor, prudence, " or decency ought to fhut the mouth of innocence; that " fhame and guilt alone are filent in the day of enquiry"-____ When this day of enquiry is to come, and who is to be the fubject of it, I know not; but let him learn that there are many cafes, wherein it is not honeft, and many others may occur wherein it is not prudent, to fay all that might be faid either in defence or in excuse; that is, when the defence or excuse of ourselves must affect others, not concerned in the debate. In fuch cafes the most innocent will rather bear the imputation of imaginary crimes, by keeping filence, than be guilty of a real crime, by breaking it; and to carry this as far as it can be carried, inftances might be produced of men, who have died, rather than accuse others, whose blood was thirfted after more than theirs.

Much hath been faid, and great complaints have been made, of the torture, as it is called in this libel, given to another gentleman's actions. If, by this, be meant ranfacking into all the private and public paffages of his life, and wrefting every one into a crime; far be it from me to approve in his cafe, what I abhor this libeller for doing in the cafe of another. But is it really fo? Have we feen accufations of treachery and ingratitude towards feveral, who are dead, and towards any, who are living, infifted upon, in the former cafe? Has it been reproached to the patrons of the remarker, that they wormed out of power a perfon, to whom they were nearly allied, and ought to have been firmly attached by gratitude and friendship? And yet is that a subject, which affords nothing to be faid ? Are there no circumstances, which might be aggravated at least? Are there no strong colors, which might be laid? Even I should not be at a loss to do it, if I thought it fair to do it; if I thought it honeft to push any man to a filence, of which I might take a feeming advantage, or to a neceffity of juftifying or excufing himfelf by faying what, fupposing him innocent, he ought not to fay. Are there no facts relating to former transactions of great importance not commonly known, and yet not abfolutely fecrets, which remain still unmentioned ?---In short, is it not apparent that there are men, who accuse, indeed, when the immediate fubject of debate leads, and provokes them neceffarily and unwillingly to it, whilft there are others, who wait for no fuch neceffity, but accufe merely to defame.

IT would be tedious, not difficult, to go through this whole invective; to deny with truth many things, which are falfely affirmed ; and, by giving a just turn to others, to fet them in a very different light from that wherein the author exposes them to public view; to explain what he perplexes; to diffinguish what he confounds. But I shall not take this task upon me, for the reasons I have given, and for others which I am going to give.

As to the conduct, which the perfon, against whom fuch torrents of ribaldry are poured forth, held towards those who were were at the head of affairs, whilft he was in bufinefs, I shall only add to what hath been faid already, what no man of candor will deny; that the heat and animofity, which perpetual contests and frequent turns of party raife, have carried many, perhaps the perfon who is blamed, perhaps the perfons who blame him, to do what, in any other fituation or temper of mind, they would carefully avoid : in a word, that the juft man hath been, on fuch occasions, fometimes unjust; the good-natured man ill-natured; and the friendly man unfriendly. Few there are, I fear, who could with a fafe confcience take up the first stone upon such a trial. Few there are, who are blamelefs. But here is the difference. The just, the good-natured, the friendly man returns to the character, out of which he flarted. The unjust, the ill-natured, the unfriendly man perfifts. The first reflects with forrow on what the last reflects with triumph; and whilst one wishes undone what the heat of party carried him to do, the other is glad of the excuse of party, such as it is, to indulge the viciousness of his own nature, and to repeat unjust, ill-natured and unfriendly actions to the living and even to the dead.

THERE is an example before us, which may ferve to illuftrate what I have faid.---Great advantage is taken of a memorial fent to the late queen, by the late earl of OXFORD, wherein many hard reflections are made on others; but the hardeft of all on the perfon here referred to. He is painted in the worft colors, and accufed to the queen of the greateft faults: Should I defcend into the particulars, I might fhew that the accufations were groundlefs, and point out, perhaps, the unjuft caufes of fufpicions which were taken, as well as the motives to the writing that memorial, which I with had never been written for a reafon very different from that which the remarker would be ready to affign. But I fhall not defcend into any fuch particulars, nor give a double advantage to the malicious, who would be juft as well pleafed to have any handle given them by the living, of inveighing against the dead, as they are ready to feize, on every occasion, that which was given them, fo many years ago, by one, who is now dead, of inveighing against the living.

THE perfons, who had the honor to ferve the late queen, in the laft period of her life, have been thefe twenty years the fubjects of great clamor. If the differences which happened amongst them fo long ago, gave in fome measure, as I apprehend that they did, both occasion and force to this clamor, it would be strange conduct, indeed, in those of them who remain alive, and in the relations and friends of those of them who are dead, to preferve the spirit of difference, and to affift in reviving this clamor.

The day will come, when authentic hiftory will relate the paffages of those times, without regard to the partial views of any party, or the particular defence of any man. Till this day does come, every one must decide, or fuspend his judgment, as he fees reason to do; and they, who may fuffer by these judgments, must bear it with that temper and respect, which is due from every private man to public censures; nay, even to public prejudices.

But what hath all this to do with the characters and conduct of the noble pair ? Suppose the men in power, two reigns ago, to have been angels of darkness, will it follow that the two honorable patrons of the remarker are angels of light? What then is the meaning of s great a clamor, affectedly raifed on so flender an occasion as the Craftsman of the twentyfecond of May gave; wherein little was faid, and that little with 24 with much moderation, after much provocation? Why are fo many pens employed, and fo great pains taken, to divert the attention of the public from prefent to past transactions; from national confiderations to perfonal altercations ?--- The reafon is obvious; and no other reason in nature can be affigned. The noble pair have been hard pushed, on their management of public affairs, both at home and abroad. Not only their errors have been pointed out; gross, palpable errors; but a long feries of error; a whole fystem of cool, deliberate, conducted, defended, expensive error hath been laid open to public view. What I believe never to have happened before, hath happened on these occasions. The noble pair have been admonifhed in time, and fhewn the precipice, into which, whoever led, they were both falling. The confequences of their meafures have been foretold as early as possible, and even whilst the caufes was laying. Surely this conduct, on the part of their adverfaries, favors more of public spirit than of private refentment; and yet, when they have taken advantage of it, they have flopt short and triumphed in their escape, as they did in the cafe of the Irish recruits. These very admonitions, which gave them time and opportunity to do fo, have been modeftly attributed to private refentment alone; tho' nothing can be more manifest than this; that private refentment would have found its account better in filence, would have preferred acculations to admonitions, and would have waited longer to have ftruck more home.

SOMETIMES, inftead of flopping fhort, they have gone on, anfwering for and being anfwered for, till the events have juftified the predictions; till the inconveniencies, difadvantages and difficulties, against which the noble pair had been warned in vain, have followed and increased upon them; till even their apologists have been forced to allow fome errors, and till they they themfelves have confefied their boafted fyftem to be wrong, by changing it, and by boafting of the change. Even after all this, they have complained of clamor; and they ftill complain, as if there had never been the leaft occafion for it given by them.---How their new fchemes are planned, and how they will be purfued; whether thefe able men have failed hitherto, becaufe they fet out on miftaken principles of policy, or whether they have failed for want of fkill to conduct the righteft, we fhall foon fee.

But these are not the only circumstances, which have borne, and still bear hard upon them .--- In the course of these and other difputes, it feems to have been plainly and fully proved; that fuch principles have been established, and fuch doctrines have been taught by the ministerial writers, as tend manifestly to deftroy the freedom of the British government. Such are, the dependency, I mean the corrupt dependency, of parliaments on the crown; the necessity of flanding armies, notwithftanding the danger of them to liberty; and fome other points, which I need not recapitulate. It is fufficiently known how much, and with how much reason, the far greater part of mankind have been alarmed at these attempts; which, if they fucceed, must hurt not only the inferior and temporary interests, but the greatest and most permanent political intereft, which a Briton can have at heart; that of the conftitution of this government.

As thefe things have been objected ftrongly on one fide, fo endeavors have been ufed on the other, to difguife and to palliate them, or to evade the confequences drawn from them. But thefe endeavors have not fucceeded. How, indeed, fhould they fucceed? As well might thofe, who make them, expect to perfuade mankind that flavery and beggary are preferable to liberty liberty and wealth, as to make the world believe that thefe bleffings can be preferved to Britain by the very means, by which they have been loft in fo many other free countries.

SINCE this therefore cannot be imposed; fince the minds of men cannot be convinced of fuch abfurdities, they must be diverted, if possible, from the subject. A new cry is therefore raifed, or an old one rather is revived. Disputes, which inflamed the minds of men, whilft the affairs they relate to were transacting, and the conflict of parties was the most fierce, are renewed at a time, when they can be of no benefit to the public, and when the fame motives of party fubfift no longer. One man, in particular, is made the fubject of new invective. Nothing, which malice can fuggeft, and ill-nature and illmanners utter, is omitted to render his perfon odious, and to represent his defigns as dangerous. In the fame breath, we are told that this odious, this dangerous man is endeavoring to come into power once more. He stands again " a candidate " for grace and truft. He would again administer the public, " abandon it's allies, and facrifice it's honor. Nothing will " fatisfy him but the power, which he once abufed and would " again abuse ; the trusts, which he once betrayed and would " again betray." These are represented, with equal modesty and fairnefs, to be his requests; and the hero of the remarker, that is, the remarker's paymafter, who administers the public fo righteoufly; who never abandoned it's allies; neither the emperor nor France; who never facrificed it's honor to one, nor it's intereft to both; who never abufed his power, nor betrayed his truft, through ambition, through pride, through private interest, or private pique; this perfon is applauded for his opposition to fuch requests, for his just and fatal discernment.

WHAT fatality there may be in his difcernment, I know. not; but furely there is a fatality, which attends those who indulge themselves in speaking and writing, without any regard to truth. How could it happen elfe that the remarker fhould fo egregioufly contradict himfelf, and deftroy in his fortieth page the whole drift of his thirty-ninth? This bold and rash scribbler takes upon him to marshal and to characterize infolently the friends of the man he rails at. If I was not of that number myfelf, I fhould probably fay more on the fubject. This however I am under an obligation to fay; that the friends of this gentleman must be fuch to his perfon. They cannot be fo to his power. That he takes it as the greatest compliment, which can be made to him, to have a fympathy of nature and a conformity of principles and defigns with them attributed to him; that he thinks their friendship an honor to him; fuch an honor as the warmest of his enemies have caufe to envy, and do envy; fuch an honor as the highest of his enemies would be heartily proud to obtain, and have not been able to obtain.

THE friends now of this gentleman, whom he is fometimes faid to lead, and who are fometimes faid to employ him as their tool, juft as it fuits the prefent purpofe of fcandal to fay; thefe very friends, it feems, the very men, who defend him, "would never raife him above his prefent low condition, nor "make him the partner of their fuccefs."---However they may employ him, the remarker and his patrons know how they mean to reward him.---Since this is the cafe, fince they know it to be fo; for what reafon, in the name of wonder, is all this buftle made about fo infignificant a tool ?---Why fo many endeavors to raife a jealoufy, and give an alarm, as if this man was aiming again at power ?---Why fo much merit afcribed to the noble pair, for keeping him out of it ?---His own own friends would not raife him to it .--- How ridiculous then is the affectation of his enemies, who value themfelves on their opposition to him?

LET the noble pair stand or fall by their own merits, or demerits. I dare answer to them and to the world, upon better foundations than those of the remarker's laying, that their continuance in power will never break the fpirit of this man, nor their fall from it excite his ambition. His ambition, whatever may have been faid or thought about it, hath been long fince dead. A man must be dead himfelf, who is utterly infenfible of all that happens, either to the public or to himfelf; but he who feeks nothing but retreat, and that stability of fituation, which is effential to the quiet of it, hath furely no ambition. Now that this is the cafe, and hath been long the cafe of the gentleman, concerning whom I fpeak, I know to be true, and I affirm boldly. He never had the leaft, I fay more, he never would have the greateft obligations to any country, except his own; and yet fo defirous was this man of reft and quiet, that he was contented to enjoy them where fortune had prefented them to him. A little franknefs might have kept him abroad all his life, without complaint. Much art has been employed to confine him at home, and to teaze him there. If forgetting all former perfecutions, he refented the laft, would he be much to blame?

I AM not confcious of having faid, in this paper, a word against the truth; and I am fure that I have the fame truth on my fide, when I affert that this man, whom the libeller reprefents to be fo turbulent, fo outragious, and of fuch pertinacious ambition, however he might have been willing formerly to have had the obligation to the noble pair, of enjoying, by their affiftance, the full measure of his late majefty's VOL. I. 111-intended goodnefs, would decline with fcorn, after all that has paffed, to be reinftated in his former fituation, at the intolerable expence of having the leaft appearance of an obligation to them. Neither they, nor their advocates, can be half fo folicitous to keep him out of power, and even out of a ftate of afpiring after power, as he is determined againft the firft, and indifferent about the laft.

I AM fenfible that all this may appear a little improbable to the perfons I oppose. It will be hard for them to conceive that the man, who has once tafted power, can ever renounce it in earneft. No wonder they fhould think in this manner. Those who find nothing in themselves to reft upon with fatisfaction, must lean on power, on riches, or both, and on other external objects. Nay, those who have of the two vices, ambition and avarice, the meaneft in the most eminent degree; and who would be glad to quit their power, and to retire with their gains, may be afraid to quit it, because they have abused it. They may be fo miferable as to fee no fecurity out of power, nor any other in it, except that precarious, that temporary fecurity, which is the last and useful refuge of defperate men; the continuing the fame violences to maintain, by which they acquired their power; the keeping up of diffentions, and the embroiling of affairs; those noble arts, by which they rofe.

But there are men in the world, who know that there is fomething in life better than power, and riches; and fuch men may prefer the low condition, as it is called by the remarker, of one man, to the high condition of another. There are men who fee that dignity may be difgraced, and who feel that difgrace may be dignified. Of this number is the gentleman whom I have undertaken to defend; who poffeffes his his foul without hopes or fears, and enjoys his retreat without any defires beyond it. In that retreat, he is obedient to the laws, dutiful to his prince, and true to his oaths. If he fails in thefe refpects, let him be publicly attacked; let public vengeance purfue and overtake him; let the noble pair indulge for once their paffions in a juft caufe. If they have no complaints, of this nature, to make againft him, from whence does this particular animofity proceed? Have they complaints of any other kind to make, and of a private nature? If they have, why is the public troubled on this account?----I hope the remarker's mafk is now taken off; that the true drift of all this perfonal railing is enough expofed; and that the attention of mankind will be brought back to thofe more important fubjects, which have been already flarted, and to thofe which every day may furnifh.

AFTER what has been here faid, the gentleman, in whofe defence I have appeared, can have no reafon of honor to enter, by himfelf, or his friends, into thefe altercations; and if my opinion can prevail, fhould thefe libellers continue to fcold, and to call names, they fhould be left to do it, without reproof, or notice. The anfwer now given fhould ftand as a "Final anfwer to all they have faid, and to all they "may think fit to fay hereafter."
